Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Antelope County Courthouse is located on the east side of Main Street and just north of the main business district of Neligh. The northeast corner of the building is on the exact center of block 5 of the original town. The courthouse is a moderately pretentious two-story building of pressed brick construction. Measuring 63 x 68 feet, it has high rectangular windows on the first story and arched windows on the second story. Through a rather plain entrance, a central hallway leads to the various county offices. A second entrance is on the south side, facing toward the business district, and a third is on the east side, facing toward the present highway. On the second floor, the courtroom and judges chambers are located. The interior hallways, offices, and courtroom are very plain yet functional in design. On the outside, the only decorative features consists of tinwork trim and a terra-cotta statue of an antelope, standing high above the main west entrance. Purchased by the ladies of Antelope County, the statue was exhibited at the Chicago Exposition of 1893.

Originally the courthouse was crowned by a large four-sided clock tower. Four smaller pyramids were built into the roof at each corner of the building. With the tower, the building was nearly 100 feet high. Arched trusses were used to support the tower and Howe trusses were used to carry the rest of the ceiling. Due to extreme deterioration, the clock tower was removed in 1964 and a new roof built over; the smaller pyramids remain.

In 1966, a new office annex was constructed just north of the courthouse. The annex is a separate building and not connected to the courthouse, maintaining the original structure's integrity. The interior of the courthouse has been slightly altered as some of the original offices such as county clerk and treasurer were moved into the annex, and were replaced by other county offices. With the exception of the removed clock tower, the Antelope County Courthouse remains essentially unchanged since its construction in 1894.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Antelope County Courthouse symbolizes Neligh's growth and prosperity in the nineteenth century. It is both one of the oldest courthouse buildings still in use and one of about 10 remaining nineteenth century courthouses in Nebraska.

When Antelope County was organized, the small settlement of Oakdale in the southeastern part of the county was selected as county seat. In 1873, Neligh was founded in a more central location, and efforts began to move the county seat there. After a bitter struggle, Neligh won out and the county offices moved there in 1883. From 1883 to 1894, the offices were housed in two rented buildings, costing the county $1,000 a year. Several elections were held to pass bond issues for the construction of a courthouse building, but were defeated by the vote of outlying precincts, particularly in the Oakdale area. On June 5, 1894, a proposal for a tax levy for the purpose of building a courthouse finally passed.

The building plans drawn by George E. MacDonald of Lincoln were selected, but later were found to be incomplete, and Fred Thornton of Neligh finished the drawings. J. N. Mills was hired as the contractor with the stipulation that he was to hire county labor for the work. Also he was to give preference to home work and materials when ever possible. On August 2, construction of the building began. The courthouse was finished at a cost of $15,238 and dedicated on January 11, 1895.

With the completion of the courthouse, the location of the county seat was permanently fixed in Neligh. Neligh became the most important town in the county with the benefit of being county seat and also having a successful flour mill.

As county government grew, the courthouse proved inadequate for housing all county offices. By 1900, the sheriff's office and jail were moved into the former Gates College Gymnasium which the county purchased for $800. In 1966, a separate annex building for the county clerk, treasurer, and other offices was built to the north of the courthouse. However, the building of the annex and the removal of the deteriorated clock tower insured the continued use of the old courthouse.

Because of necessary replacement, nineteenth century courthouses have become a relative rarity in Nebraska. Rather than destroy and build new, Antelope County continued to use the original structure. The Antelope County Courthouse represents the progress of its people and was the most impressive building in the county. Today it is an excellent example of the many such courthouses that were built in the nineteenth century and have since been torn down to make way for modern structures.
