John Hancock is better known for his political involvement than for his trading activities; nevertheless he was the holder of a vast fortune by the age of twenty-seven due to his being the heir to his merchant uncle's fortune. Hancock never showed any great talent for trade and at the encouragement of Samuel Adams was soon much more involved in politics than in commerce.

Since for all practical purposes, cash was non-existant in the New England area during the post Revolutionary era, bartering was commonplace. Items of merchandise were whalebone and oil, molasses, cured fish, tar, leather, bales of fur, salt, and coal were exchanged for the commodities of rich fabrics, buckles, fans and swords, hourglasses, rum wine, tea and ornate furniture. Among those products, not surprisingly, rum had the quickest turnover. John Hancock had warehouses and wharves along the entire coast, along with a number of ships to transport his goods. His investments in Maine, however, did not appear to be very lucrative - for instance, he inherited from his Uncle Thomas fifty thousand acres of vast timber tracts in Maine which failed to appreciate materially in John's lifetime.

He also owned a small business in the remote little town of York, Maine in the form of a wharf, store and storehouse, that wer situated just south of Sewall's Bridge on the York River.

There seem to be dissenting opinions on Hancock's manner of acquisition of his York warehouse. Some researchers believe it was acquired in a simple sale from Daniel Bragdon, while others say that Hancock had taken it from Bragdon in a mortgage foreclosure. They do agres that he only owned one half of the warehouse, which he shared with Joseph/Tucker. After Hancock's death, the heir, his brother Ebenezer sold his share of the warehouse to Tucker. Further confusion exists over the question of whether Hancock ever actually saw his property, or whether he carried through the deal by means of a local representative. Daniel Bragdon did make several trips to Massachusetts for political reasons, and the two may have met during the various conventions. One source states that it is "doubtful if John Hancock himself ever came to York," whereas another convincingly describes a specific visit of Hancock, accompanied by his wife and his official suite, to the home of Judge Johnathan Sayward on June 24, 1791. The Governor and the Judge were old friends in pre-Revolutionary times and in 1767, Sayward had launched a brig for the Governor. In the years following, their political paths had widely diverged, and the visit was a gracious gesture to Sayward, a Royalist, who was on the losing side in the Revolutionary War. A portion of the Judge's diary is cited as proof of this visit:

"Governor Hancock and Lady paid me an agreeable visit and dined with a large company with which he honoured me and in confidence regained my judgement of continuation of statement of significance:

men for the good of the country in which I hope I have done some service." The reasons for Hancock's obtaining the York Warehouse and wharf were many in addition to being a secluded hide-away for his valuable private possessions during the hard times, it was a handy place to hide contraband goods from the suspicious, prowling tax collectors.

After Ebenezer Hancock relinquished his inherited York property to Joseph Tucker, it was passed down through generations.
