Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Coal House in Williamson, Mingo County, West Virginia, is a unique structure, built entirely of coal.

Constructed in 1933, this one-story rectangular building was constructed under the supervision of H.T. Hicks, an architect from Welch, West Virginia, and Associate Architect D.M. Goode, a local Williamson merchant. Sixty-five tons of Bituminous Coal, mined from the nearby Winifrede Seam, were utilized in the construction of the Coal House.

The coal was cut into random size blocks and laid in random range. The outside surfaces are remarkably intact, due largely to coats of weatherproofing varnish applied periodically to protect the coal masonry from deterioration.

All of the openings in the building, windows and the main entrance, are arched. The front elevation portal is a round compound arch, made up of voussoirs of coal.

The colossal entrance portal is flanked by two corner buttresses, or pseudo-pilasters. The entrance door itself is a large double door surmounted by a large fanlight and flanked by sidelights.

The entire building rests on masonry blocks, set on concrete footing. The walls of the Coal House are capped with stone coping.

The interior of the Coal House has been re-modeled several times, and today consists of walnut paneling, wall to wall carpet, and a plush, modernistic red decor that contrasts well with the black exterior of the building.

Located on Court House Square, the Coal House occupies one of Williamson's most prominent places, both in physical setting and in the minds of this community.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Coal House, located in Williamson, Mingo County, West Virginia, is a building significant as one of only two such structures in the state, and is of exceptional importance as a symbol of the dominant economic activity of this region of West Virginia.¹ It is also significant for its association with several figures of historical significance in West Virginia,² and as a source of overwhelming community pride.

Explanatory Notes

In 1931 O.W. Evans, Manager of the Norfolk & Western Railroad's Fuel Department in Williamson, hit upon the idea of building a structure entirely of coal in order to symbolize the dominance of coal in the region and Williamson's claim to be "the Heart of the Billion Dollar Coal Field." Mr. Evans organized a campaign which eventually bore fruit with the completion of the Coal House in 1933, constructed under the supervision of Welch architect H.T. Hicks from 65 tons of Bituminous coal mined in the local area and donated by coal companies. At the time of its construction it was the only structure built of coal in West Virginia. Since that time, another "coal house" was built in Lewisburg, Greenbrier County (1959) using 30 tons of coal and designed as a private residence. The Coal House in Williamson, housing the Tug Valley Chamber of Commerce, stands on a lot immediately adjacent to the Mingo County Court House, symbolizing the vital link between the coal industry and the life of Mingo County.

When Mr. O.W. Evans conceived the Coal House project, it was evident that if the project was ever to come to fruition it would have to have the support of individuals prominent in Mingo County public life. Two of the individuals whom Evans turned to for support, and who immediately gave him assistance, were Wells Goodykoontz and M.Z. White. Their aid was instrumental in rounding up support for the project among other community leaders, and their names appear prominently upon a bronze plaque attached to the Coal House wall.

Wells Goodykoontz (1872-1944) was a prominent attorney and West Virginia politician. President of the W. Va. Bar Association in 1917-18, Goodykoontz served in the W. Va. House of Delegates from 1911 to 1913 and in the West Virginia Senate, 1915-1919 where he rose to become first Majority Leader (1916) and then (1917) President of the Senate. In 1918 he was elected to the U. S. House of Representatives from West Virginia's 5th Congressional District. Re-elected in 1920, Goodykoontz was defeated for a third term in Congress in 1922. In 1924 he sought election to the U. S. Senate from W. Va., but lost in the Republican primary to Guy D. Goff, though receiving a respectable 19.7% of the vote. He later served on the W. Va. Tax Commission (1925-28) before returning to the private practice of law.

M. Z. White (1872-1945) began his public career humbly enough, serving as Justice of the Peace for Thacker, in Mingo County, from 1896 to 1900. In 1901 White was elected Mayor of Williamson and was re-elected to three one year terms, serving until 1905. He then saw five years of service on the Mingo County Court (1905-10) before being elected to the W. Va. Senate in 1910. Warden of the State Penitentiary from 1913 to 1918, White was vice president of the 1st National Bank of Williamson from 1918 until his second election to the W. Va. Senate in 1922. M. Z. White served in the Senate from 1923 to 1935, and from 1925 until 1931, losing in the Republican primary to T. C. Townsend, though receiving 29.3% of the vote that was split among five candidates. M. Z. White served as President of the 1st National Bank of Williamson from 1935 until his death.

3. From the outset of the Coal House project, the people of Williamson gave it their enthusiastic support. Local coal companies donated coal, local business leaders put up money and materials and, in this time of economic depression, workers donated their time and labor. An unusual aspect of the building, and one that sets it apart from most public buildings in West Virginia, is the bronze plaque on the Coal House that not only lists the architects and major sponsors, but names every local company, businessman, mason, carpenter and laborer who worked on the building. The Coal House was truly a community effort as few public buildings are, and is today the major object of interest and community pride in Mingo County.
