DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Estate Nisky, a working plantation, was purchased by the Moravians in 1755 to supplement its mission at New Herrnhut in the eastern section of St. Thomas. The estate continued in use as a plantation through the early part of the 19th century. Today the complex, which is located 1½ miles west of Charlotte Amalie off the Harwood Highway , consists of a manse, church, slave quarters and other outbuildings and a small cemetery. Nothing, with the possible exception of the stone walls dividing the site into planting plots, remains from the original plantation constructed in 1771.

The manse, now used as a school and offices, was largely rebuilt after a fire in 1971, but much of the exterior form of the original 1829 structure remains. The manse is two stories in height, with a tall attic created by the Jerkinhead roof design favored by the Moravians in their mission houses. Constructed of plastered rubble masonry, the first level has three bays in the north wall, with six bays in each of the east and west The south wall is terraced into a hill rising to the south of the manse. The east wall has six windows, secured with square vertical iron bars. The lower level of the west wall originally had six full length door openings fronting on a brick terrace, laid in a herringbone pattern. The second, third, fifth and sixth doors have been shortened and replaced with windows. All openings on this level have brick linings with round headed arches. The board shutters are later, but they are hung on early wrought iron straps and pintles, probably reused from the shutters lost in the fire.

The upper level has five windows in the north end wall. There are six openings in each of the east and west walls, all later altered for the installation of windows in the east facade. first, second and fifth openings in the west wall have also been made into windows, with the sixth changed to a low service The first bay at the north end has been enclosed with frame and shingle. The jambs of all openings are splayed and lined with brick. They have wood casings and panelled shutters. The upper floor of the west wall opens on to an arcaded gallery which extends the full length of the manse. Supported by six 26" x 26" brick piers with molded Doric capitals and bases at the level, the gallery has wood columns and balustrade, with a later tin roof. The upper level of this gallery is at grade at its south end because of the hill previously mentioned. is a panelled belt course at the first floor level which extends across the end walls, and a molded three part cornice at the The cornice also returns across the end wall, creating trapezoidal attic walls, each with four rectangular windows and

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Estate Nisky is historically significant because it was a principal Virgin Islands mission of the Moravian Church, which played a major educational and spiritual role during the 18th century. Nisky was the mission of Frederick Martin, called "The Apostle to the Negroes."

Frederick Martin, the leading religious innovator of the Virgin Islands, was responsible for establishing the mission on solid foundations during his 1736-1750 ministry. He sought to make the mission as self-supporting as possible by the purchase and development of plantations. By operating these, the Moravians ensured themselves of a livelihood and made pastoral work easier.

Count Zinzendorf, leader of the Moravian movement, asked the young teacher, Augustus Gottlieb Spangenberg, just three years after he joined the colony in 1733, to conduct 18 missions to the Danish Caribbean colonies. In 1755, the small plantation called Niesky, located along Mosquito Bay Road, west to Charlotte Amalie, was purchased for a mission, and Spangenberg preached the first sermon under a cottonwood tree. He subsequently established missions in Georgia, Pennsylvania (Bethlehem), and North Carolina. He also founded the "Society for the Furtherance of the Gospel" in England.

The Moravian missions were characterized by a concern for the negro slaves' moral and intellectual development, and whites were not actively recruited as converts. The mission directed its energies to instruction in both religion and general education. Slaves were encouraged to assume responsible positions within the Church and community. Many were trained as artisans. Special importance was placed on personal devotion and good conduct. The brethren taught that manual labor, freely undertaken, was not necessarily degrading and that such skills could bring economic security. The mission's example from 1732 to 1828 provided the foundation upon which emerging colonial social patterns were to be established.

Since the plantation owners were uneasy about slaves meeting together at night - even at church - the Moravians undertook sheathed with later novelty siding laid horizontal. The roof dates from the 1971 fire and is tin, supported by new steel trusses and columns. There is a single hipped dormer centered in the east and west planes of the roof. The floor and interior plaster walls in the upper level also date from 1971.

The ruins of a kitchen remain attached to the upper level of the south end wall, with part of the oven, fireplace and chimney visible above ground. A later cistern, 10X14' remains just beyond the kitchen ruin. A walled terrace runs perpendicular to the manse containing a 20x40' one and one-half story slave quarter and two bell towers, the eastern one early, the western 20th century. The slave quarter is built of brick and stone rubble, with brick linings at the corners and openings. There are five full length openings in each of the north and south walls, the end walls being blank. The openings have flat brick arches with wood heads and casings and board shutters on straps and pintles. The gable roof, now sheathed with corrugated tin, has been raised one-half story, as evidenced by a change in materials, from rubble below the original roof line to brick above, and by ghostings on the interior walls.

The present church, north of the terrace and west of the manse/school, dates from 1967, but is constructed on the foundations of a church dating from 1858. This existing foundation may include the remains of the foundation of the original 1771 church, and was rebuilt in 1867 and 1871 when the preceding churches were demolished by hurricanes. The 1967 church is 83x50'8", with a single high story set on the high foundation walls. The upper part is frame, sheathed with wood shingles, and has a corrugated tin roof. The foundation walls are plastered rubble masonry. The church has five bays in the long north-south walls, and five bays in the east end wall. The west end wall has a one story shed roof appendage. The openings in the foundation walls, originally full length, have been shortened for windows.

A one and one-half story 33x36' brick and rubble outbuilding is nestled into a hillside just north of the church. The roof is gabled at the south end and hipped at the north. There is a window in the south end wall, and a door flanked by single windows in the east wall. The roof is corrugated tin, and the walls have been plastered. A later concrete and an early brick cistern are located just east of this outbuilding. There are also a number of stone walls forming terraces which surround the entire complex, and a small cemetery.

private instruction. Diaries reveal counselor-teacher relationships as typical. The means of conversion was principally exemplary personal conduct by the missionaries. The missionaries taught themselves Creole and found the slaves eager to learn English. Physical punishment was abhorred and discipline was positive. Under von Scholten, the missionaries served as teachers and administrators in the schools the Government built.

By the late 18th century, most Virgin Islands planters were convinced that it was to their own advantage to educate negro slaves. Despite initial local opposition, but with the nominal Danish support, the Moravian Church became the religious institution most vitally involved with the well-being of slaves. Thus, in the islands, law and religion were aligned with plantocracy and interwoven with production, unlike the Catholic traditions of Cuba and Brazil.

The Moravian mission station and plantation were founded in 1755 at Nisky, probably named after a Polish church, on the northeast foot of the hill along side Mosquito Bay Road. The original 18th century church probably was a large, simple wooden building with a half-hipped roof and painted windows resting on a masonry basement. Its original date and style are unknown, but records exist for the new 1771 facilities. The hurricane of September 21, 1819 damaged the site, but the building stood. A new Mission houe was occupied on July 17, 1829. The 1771 church was torn down and a new one consecrated in October, 1858, but it was destroyed by hurricanes in 1867 and 1871, each time being rebuilt on the old foundations. By 1852, the church had 464 communicants and a congregation of 1,316, served by a pastor, his wife and an assistant.

The manse at Nisky, while altered, is of architectural significance because of the typical Moravian plan and design, with the full width, two story fallery and clipped hip roof. The slave quarters are also of architectural interest.
