DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Situated in a grove of oak and cedar trees, Zion Episcopal Church, built c.1848, is a superb example of the revival of the English Gothic style.

Zion Church Talbotton, the original name given to Zion Episcopal Church, is a one-story brown, vertical boarded, heart pine structure with a central, triple sectioned square tower. The foundation is of stuccoed brick. Lancet windows and tudor arches define all openings: a simple tudor arch forms the entranceway; narrow, multi-paned, and shuttered lancet windows occur on all sides, with double ones on the side facade and single ones on the front. A flat decorative "carpentar gothic" scrolled dentil cornice defines the eaves on the side facade. A trefoil motif runs along the bargeboard of the pitched roof on the front facade.

In the dimly lit interior are the altar, communion rail, lectern pulpit and prayer desk - all made of walnut. A Pilcher pipe organ, installed c.1850, is still operated by a hand pump. The choir loft at the east end of the building opposite the sanctuary, above the narthex, is flanked on each side by a gallery, where slaves worshipped. The original box family pews, each with its own door, in a double row in the center and a single row on each side, remain as originally placed. The pulpit-lectern and prayer desk are built against opposite walls of the chancel and elevated three steps above the level of the chancel floor.

Few changes have been made over Zion's 125 year history; fans have been installed and electric heaters have replaced a pot bellied stove.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Zion Episcopal Church, consecrated in 1853 and originally supported as a missionary church, is a superb example of a small, wooden country church in the English Gothic style of the Tudor period as interpreted in the mid 19th century. In time sequence and style it bears a direct relationship to the small, rural church designs which were published in 1852 in Richard Upjohn's Rural Architecture.

In 1847 the preliminary steps for organizing Zion Church Talbotton were made under the zealous missionary spirit of an Episcopal Clergyman, the Rev. Richard Johnson. Aided financially by South Carolina rice planters who had been his parishoners, Mr. Johnson had moved to Talbotton and within a year his small congregation built a wooden structure, Zion Episcopal Church. Although the congregation has always been small, (presently there are only three members), Zion Episcopal Church is a monument to the mid-century missionary movement.

Architecturally, Zion is a nationally significant rural version of a revival of the English Gothic ecclesiastical structure, reflecting the work of Richard Upjohn. No documents support direct influence, but Upjohn was known to supply plans and particulars for construction for needy parishes because he believed he had a religious and architectural obligation as an This continuous demand for the simple structures led him to architect. produce Upjohn's Rural Architecture in 1852, to satisfy those parishes who were too poor to afford even the most modest fee. In design, Upjohn's St. Thomas Church in Hamilton, N.Y. (1852), Trinity Church in Warsaw, N.Y. (1854) and the designs in his Rural Architecture are very similar in feeling to this Talbotton, Georgia example. Careful consideration of details is given in this English Gothic revival structure, details such as the delicate trefoil bargeboard motif, the scrolled dentil work on the side cornice, the crenellated parapets that crown each of the building's roof points and especially the Tudor arch work around the entrance way. These are not merely tossed on but carefully placed and combined as part of an overall design. Its interior is equally well designed in the chosen style.

Zion Church is one of two Georgia examples of Episcopal churches in the rural English Gothic revival style (the other bears little resemblance to Upjohn models). Its excellence is underlined by comparison. Its romantic Sir Walter Scott character, its date and location in western Georgia, its virtually unaltered state combine to give it national architectural standing; it is a superb surviving example of a national architectural movement which reached into the hinterlands of the deep southern frontier.
