DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Carefully drawn plans in the files of the Army Engineers give us a detailed picture of "Old Fort Arbuckle" as it must have looked in the fall of 1834. A fairly routine affair, it consisted of a square picket stockade of cedar logs with a single blockhouse at the northeast corner. Twenty-five feet square, its second story was canted to a 45-degree angle so as to command both walls. Inside the stockade were five log buildings arranged around three sides of a parade that was 60 yards square. Round cedar logs were used throughout and rooms for officers and enlisted men alike were 22 feet square. On the north was a double company quarters structure, with a six-foot open space between. Adjoining it on the east was the "Temporary Kitchen," separated by a massive double stone chimney that served both buildings. Similar company quarters were erected on the east, although its kitchen section was never built. A third double structure, of hewn logs, was built on the west side of the parade to accommodate the officers. It differed from the other two in that its double stone chimney was built in the central open space so to accommodate both rooms. Its temporary kitchen was given a more humble stick-and-mud chimney.

Today the logs have long since rotted away. Remaining on the site now are only stone foundations, chimney piles, and still other rocks to mark location of the fort's well.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The first of several Fort Arbuckles to be established in present Oklahoma -- and for this reason usually referred to now as "Old Fort Arbuckle -- the frontier military post nominated here played a brief, but important role in the establishment of the Creek Nation. After abandonment its buildings were used for a time by the Creeks' best known Civil War figure, the tragic Ophtholeyahola and his band of Union sympathizers. In the years after the war the grounds served as a trading post on what had been for more than a half-century a busy travel route for Indian and white man alike.

* * *

When the Creek Indians were removed in the late 1820s from the southeastern United States to Indian Territory they had not only a new country to get used to, but unfriendly neighbors to learn to live with as well. The proud Osages had given up this Arkansas River area just west of what is now Tulsa, but they remained close enough to cause worry, if not actual trouble. By 1831 the government decided a "military presence" would serve as something of an inter-tribal peacemaker.

The Rev. Isaac McCoy was sent out to reconnoiter. His escort was under the command of Lt. James L. Dawson. They blazed a route along the north side of the Arkansas from Fort Gibson to the mouth of the Cimarron, which they crossed here to proceed westward. This so-called "Dawson Road" was followed in 1832 by the famed Washington Irving party that produced A Tour on the Prairies. The following year General Henry Leavenworth, headquartered at Fort Gibson, sent Lt. Dawson out again, this time to locate likely sites for military posts. From the Cimarron River crossing he proceeded south and west to Little River, returned to recommend three locations. In June 1834 Brevet Major George Birch, with two companies of the Seventh Infantry, proceeded to build Fort Arbuckle on the first recommended site - a dry, fairly open ridge on the north bank of the Arkansas, a little over two miles south-east of the Cimarron's mouth. Near by was the point where an old Osage hunting trail crossed the Arkansas.

This post was garrisoned for only a year. But its presence near the point where Creek, Cherokee and Osage territories met undoubtedly contributed to maintaining peace between them. This in turn helped maintain a climate in which could grow the newly established Creek settlement of "Tal-l-see" or "Tallassee" ... present-day Tulsa.

Fort Arbuckle (Site No. 1)

Following abandonment by the military, the old cedar pole stockade began to decay. Some buildings were still standing after the Civil War, however. These were used for trading post purposes until around 1880. And the river crossings in the area were used until 1893, when the "Cherokee Strip" was thrown open to settlement.

The immediate post site has now been purchased by the Tulsa County Historical Society. Stones from foundations and fallen chimneys clearly locate the buildings. Since this is the only pole-stockade type post in the area it is hoped that a partial reconstruction can serve to dramatize the role "Old Fort Arbuckle" played in making possible the development of this corner of the Creek Nation.

Fort Arbuckle (Site No. 1 - "Old" Fort Arbuckle)

In the summer of 1977 a professionally directed search was made for additional evidence to indicate that archeological site 34-Tu-13 is indeed that of "Old" Fort Arbuckle. Careful research was conducted in both the historical and architectural areas. Meanwhile four trenches were dug on the site as basis for the archeological research. Results of this three-pronged study are contained in the official report appended to this nomination.

While the artifactual remains uncovered in the limited excavations were admittedly "disappointing" - that is, they could not be related with certainty to the fort - they were found to be "consistent" with the site. Ferhaps "more definitive" was the structural evidence - the presence of sandstone alignments that indicated structures on the site of the type the fort itself would have had. Historical and architectural findings tended to verify this and further establish the site.

Dr. Annetta L. Cheek, principal investigator in the search, summarizes her convictions like this. "It is my professional opinion that this site . . . Tu-13 . . . is the site of Old Fort Arbuckle. This interpretation is consistent with the archeological evidence, and no other interpretation available at present conforms with the evidence as well. Because the archeological remains are so scanty, I suppose that some doubt must remain, but personally I am satisfied."
