DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (If known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

We have no conclusive record of occupancy of the land at the point of the confluence of the Ohio and Kanawha when the soldiers of Andrew Lewis made camp there prior to the battle. However, a certain Hanson with a party came down the river in 1774 and on April 20, Hanson records that he "found 26 people encamp at the point to cultivate lands, others to attend the surveyors." The point was probably much broader and some longer at that time, for an early map of Point Pleasant shows a Water Street and a row of houses on the Ohio side of the point where now there is merely a slight grassy indentation fronted by rip-rap. Traditions have come down of a corn-field and drill-ground between the present cabin and the river.

Immediately after the battle, troops were left behind to erect Fort Blair, said to have included a stockade for animals. It was partly burned down in an Indian attack in 1775, if Dr. Walker's accusation at a conference with the Indians on October 14, 1775, is accurate, but the store inside was left.

The present cabin built by Walter Newman was used as a tavern and stood very near a thoroughfare. It has remained substantially unchanged, being repaired in 1901. Around 1911 it seems that the present porches were added on the river side, and the protective overhang on the eastern side.

The site where Lewis' troops camped and Fort Blair was built is now a well-kept State park. The Walter Newman cabin is used as a museum open during the tourist season. The museum has a collection of Indian relics of all periods in the attic region. Most of these came from the grounds or from the area. Other rooms are equipped with early American furnishings, along with a trunk of materials once owned by a Dr. Bennett, resident of Point Pleasant, whom the State road sign proclaims to be the first physician to perform a Caesarian operation in the United States.

At the beginning of this century, when efforts were made to commemorate the Battle of Point Pleasant, horse stables and pig stys were to be found on the ground where the dead from the battle were interred. There is doubtless still opportunity for the archeologist in the gardens and yards of this area.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE (Include Personages, Dates, Events, Etc.)

Point Pleasant was the scene of the principal engagement of Dunmore's War October 10, 1774. Col. Andrew Lewis, commanding 1,100 colonial soldiers, fought with 800 to 1000 Indians to effectively change the boundary of the frontier from the Allegheny Mountains to the Ohio River. This also opened the State of Kentucky to relatively safe settlement, a great assistance to the colonies in the approaching War of the Revolution.

Of the conflict itself, E. O. Randall wrote: "The battle of Point Pleasant was the most extensive, the most bitterly contested, and fraught with the most significance of any Indian battle in American history . . . America has no more historic soil than the ground of the Kanawha and Ohio point, reddened that October day by the blood of savage warriors and frontier woodsmen". (The Dunmore War, 1902, pp 22-23).

According to State historian Virgil Lewis, from the colonial troops in Dunmore's regiments came seven Revolutionary War generals, four governors, three senators and six congressmen.

Aside from the Battle of Point Pleasant, the point and its immediate environment under many aspects is remarkable for its historical depth:

- 1) A favorite site of many aboriginal cultures dating from paleolithic times, artifacts from which are on display in the museum at the Point;
- 2) the spot where the French under Celoron de Blainville buried a lead plate in 1749 claiming the Ohio River territory for France;
- 3) the reported site of a French trading post visited by Captain Matthew Arbuckle with his pelts in 1764; probably linked to French-Shawnee trade.
- 4) the camping place of George Washington on his trip down the Ohio, October 31 and November 3, 1770, to claim land for himself and his officers;
- 5) the site of Fort Blair, built in 1774 immediately after the battle and apparently burned by Shawnee Indians in the following year. Fort Randolph was constructed as a palisade enclosing cabins in 1776 or 1777, a short distance north of Fort Blair, near the site of the Kanawha and Michigan Railroad depot. It resisted a minor and a major attack, the latter in May of 1778, when several colonial troops were killed. It was superseded by a third important fort, 1786-95, garrisoned under the command of Thomas Lewis;
- 6) the scene of the treacherous assassination of Shawnee Chief Cornstalk, his son Elinipsico, Red Hawk, and the father of Tecumseh, held as hostages in 1777 after they had come to warn the colonists of a British and Indian coalition against the Americans; Cornstalk is buried there;

- 7) the home of the "Grenadier Squaw," sister of Cornstalk, who throughout remained faithful to the Americans and who disguised two soldiers as Indians and sent them to the Greenbrier country eastward to warn the whites of the coming of their red enemies;
- 8) the chosen site for the capital of Vandalia, a projected Ohio River colony in which leading English and American officials were interested, including Benjamin Franklin. Their plan was abandoned with the coming of the Revolutionary War;
- 9) for several years--probably from 1788 to 1794--the farm and trading post of Daniel Boone, located approximately nine hundred yards northeast from the point near the site of Fort Randolph;
- 10) the proposed terminus of the James and Kanawha waterway, only a third of which was completed;
- 11) the burial place of "Mad Ann" Bailey, a woman frontier scout;
- 12) the site of Walter Newman's house or tavern, built in 1796 or 1797, restored and still standing--said to have been constructed of logs from the Fort Blair stable or store;
- 13) the site of a monument commemorating the battle, toward which the U. S. Congress contributed $10,000 by an Act of February 17, 1908;
- 14) the place of departure of forces under George Rogers Clark when they set forth on the conquest of the Northwest Territory;
- 15) the site of a ferry established in 1791 by Thomas Lewis, son of Andrew Lewis, who originally owned 9,000 acres of land at Point Pleasant;
- 16) place of assemblage of a brigade of troops under General Joel Leftwich, October 20, 1812, going westward in the War of 1812-1814;
- 17) General Cox' point of entry into Virginia during his Kanawha Valley campaign of 1861, War of the Rebellion, and the site of General Jenkins' raid in 1863;
- 18) close to the highway bridge across the Ohio which collapsed in 1967 with the loss of 46 lives, and also close to railroad bridges across both the Ohio and Kanawha embodying pioneer features in bridge-building;
- 19) the site of "Ann Bailey" Ferry which operated well over a century, until the building of the "Silver" Bridge" in 1928.
