DESCRIPTION SUMMARY:

The Douglass Summer House, built in 1894-95, is located in the small community of Highland Beach, five miles south of Annapolis on the Chesapeake Bay. The Douglass House, situated at the corner of Wayman and Bay avenues, is one of the first built in Highland Beach which was established in 1893 by Douglass' son, Major Charles Douglass. Facing east, it enjoys a spectacular view of the Bay. The two and one-half story Queen Anne style frame dwelling measures 3 bays by 4 bays with a central entrance and has a hip roof. Prominent exterior features include a one-story wrap-around porch (which is enclosed on the south elevation). A corner tower at the second story southeast corner, is open, creating a small second story porch. The exterior walls are covered with German-siding except for the rear shed wing (west elevation) and the enclosed portion of the porch (south elevation) which are covered with board and batten siding. The roof is covered with wood shingles. Windows are 2/2 double hung sash except for the rear wing and enclosed porch area which are 4/4. The interior consists of two principal rooms on the first floor and three on the second floor. The interior walls and ceiling are clad in the original narrow beaded tongue and groove board paneling which has achieved a rich patina over the years. The Douglass House displays a high degree of integrity. A meticulous renovation in 1987 maintained a majority of the original interior and exterior fabric of the building.

SIGNIFICANCE SUMMARY:

The significance of the Douglass Summer House is derived from its relationship to the African-American resort community of Highland Beach. Located along the western shore of the Chesapeake Bay, Highland Beach was established in 1893 by Major Charles Douglass, a Civil War veteran and a son of Frederick Douglass, the famed African-American humanitarian, orator and writer. Highland Beach became a summer gathering place for prominent African-Americans, particularly from Washington, D.C. Included among the early residents are Paul Lawrence Dunbar, the poet; and Robert Terrell, the first African-American municipal judge in Washington, D.C. and his wife, Mary Church Terrell, educator and civil libertarian. Frequent visitors to the resort include Booker T. Washington; Paul Robeson, the singer and actor; and Langston Hughes, the poet. With financial assistance from his father, Major Douglass laid out the community naming the two principal streets for Reconstruction-era friends of his father. Tradition maintains that the impetus for establishing Highland Beach was a rebuff Major Douglass and his wife received from an all white neighboring resort community. The Douglass Summer House was built for Frederick Douglass in 1894-1895. Douglass, however, did not live to see it completed. Tradition says the house was designed by Douglass himself with a second floor balcony to provide a view east toward the Eastern Shore where he was born. The Douglass Summer House is the oldest house remaining in Highland Beach. This house and the one erected for Major Douglass were the first structures built in the newly laid-out community. The Major Douglass house no longer stands.

Section number 7 Page 1GENERAL DESCRIPTION:

The Douglass Summer House, built in 1894-95, is located in the small community of Highland Beach, five miles south of Annapolis on the Chesapeake Bay. The Douglass House is situated at the corner of Wayman and Bay avenues. Facing east, it enjoys a spectacular view of the Bay.

The Queen Anne style frame dwelling is two and one-half stories and has a hip roof. Prominent exterior features include a one-story wrap-around porch (which is enclosed on the south elevation). A corner tower at the second story southeast corner is open, creating a small second story porch.

The Douglass House rests on brick piers, and the porch on a ("rock-faced") decorated concrete-block pier foundation. Wooden lattice skirting is placed between the piers. The exterior walls are covered with German-siding except for the rear shed wing (west elevation) and the enclosed portion of the porch (south elevation) which are covered with board and batten siding. The roof is covered with wood shingles. Windows are 2/2 double hung sash except for the rear wing and enclosed porch area which are 4/4.

The house is three bays by four bays, with a central entrance on the principal facade (east elevation). The door consists of four glazed panes above two solid raised panels.

Inside, the house consists of two principal rooms on the first floor, (front and rear). The rear shed wing (an original porch) and the enclosed porch area on the south elevation accommodate small rooms which flank the main block.

The interior walls and ceiling treatment throughout the house consist of the original narrow beaded tongue and groove board paneling which has achieved a rich patina over the years.

Interior trim is very simple; plain board surrounds with mitered joints. The stair is located in the southwest corner of the front room. It has turned balusters and simple square newels with beveled edges and round finials.

At the top of the stair on the second floor a door leads directly out onto the small open balcony where Frederick Douglass (had he lived to see the completion of the house) would have been able to gaze upon his native Eastern Shore where he had been born a slave.

The second floor consists of three rooms - the center room has recently been partitioned to accommodate a bath and closet and the rear (west) room has also been partitioned to include a bath.

The 1987 renovation has beautifully maintained the original fabric and character of the Douglass cottage. Interior modifications have been minimal including the changes previously mentioned on the second floor. The attic, originally unfinished, was renovated for use as a bedroom. The enclosure of the porch on the first floor south elevation is an historic alteration. During the early 20th century the Douglass family enclosed and extended it for use as a kitchen, bathroom and storage room.

The siding, windows and doors are original. During the renovation, evidence of an original wood shingle roof was found under a later asphalt shingle roof. The roof was re-shingled to match the earlier roof. Evidence of the original exterior paint scheme was also discovered during renovation and utilized. (Buff colored exterior walls with dark green trim and maroon stained roof shingles.)

Several pieces of Douglass memorabilia have remained with the house, including an upright piano that belonged to Fannie Douglass (the wife of Joseph Douglass), a Mission oak dining table and buffet, a desk, and a photograph of Frederick Douglass inscribed "From Father to Son, taken in Boston, 1894."

The surrounding landscape had been left to deteriorate prior to ownership by the Bohls. Existing trees included oak and sweet gum. Some daylilies were growing on the property. The Bohl's cleared the grounds of overgrowth retaining the above mentioned plantings and added additional daylilies, blue hydrangea and crepe myrtle.

Section number 8 Page 7HISTORIC SETTING:

During the period of industrial/urban dominance in Maryland, which spanned the last quarter of the 19th century and the first quarter of the 20th century, the development of resort communities evolved. Improved transportation routes, primarily railroads, provided linkage to mountain and seaside resorts. The growing working and middle class and the upper crust of society were enjoying leisure time in unprecedented numbers. Communities such as Bay Ridge, Sherwood Forest and Gibson Island, all in Anne Arundel County, were created for white visitors and seasonal residents. Due to racial discrimination policies, wealthy black-Americans sought counterparts to the white resorts. Within this context, Highland Beach was founded in 1893 and soon became "the" gathering place for wealthy and prominent black Americans.

Tradition maintains that Highland Beach was founded by Major Charles Douglass, the son of famed abolitionist Frederick Douglass, after he and his wife Laura were denied entrance to Bay Ridge, a white resort on the Chesapeake Bay just south of Annapolis. Major Douglass purchased 44 acres adjoining Bay Ridge and developed his own resort community for his family and friends. In 1893, he purchased 500 feet of beachfront between Oyster Creek and Black Walnut Cove from Daniel and Mary Brashears. Frederick Douglass assisted financially with his son's endeavor and purchased a lot in 1893.¹

Streets were laid out. The longest street bears the name of Douglass. Other streets were named for reconstruction era friends of Frederick Douglass, namely Bruce Wayman and John Mercer Langston.

Major Douglass was the first to build a cottage at Highland Beach. Erected in 1894, the house was a large bungalow with a wrap-around porch. Unfortunately, it was demolished in the 1950s. Picnics were held in the grove of trees surrounding the house attended by guests including some of the outstanding black-Americans of the day.

Frederick Douglass, living at Cedar Hill in nearby Washington, D.C., was the second to construct a summer cottage for himself. His cottage is the subject of this nomination. Tradition maintains that he designed the house, specifically the second floor balcony facing the Chesapeake Bay, "so that I as a free man could look across the Bay to the Eastern Shore where I was born a slave." However, Douglass did not live to see it completed; he died unexpectedly at Cedar Hill on February 20, 1895. The cottage was bequeathed to his grandson Joseph H. Douglass, the son of Major Douglass, however another of Frederick's sons, Lewis Douglass, and his family occupied the cottage until 1908. Joseph Douglass and his new wife, Fannie Howard Douglass, began their annual summer visits in that year, a tradition maintained by their daughter Nettie Douglass Morris until 1986 when it was sold to the present owners, Mr. & Mrs. Charles H. Bohl.²

Highland Beach grew slowly at first. In addition to the two Douglass cottages, approximately ten were built by 1910, including a large 9-bedroom cottage for George T. Bowen, an ex-slave and affluent Baltimore caterer and one for Dr. John Francis, a prominent Washington, D.C. urologist. Both survive, as do approximately three others built before 1902. The real building boom occurred between 1910 and 1930. The majority of the thirty cottages identified by the Maryland Historical Trust in 1980 were constructed during those two decades. The majority are bungalows.³ Like the Douglass family, the George T. Bowens welcomed guests into their large cottage. In the 1890s, the educated and professional class of black Americans was small and close-knit. Because of discrimination in the South and in some areas of the North, these families found their way to Highland Beach where they were housed by the Douglass and Bowen families. Mrs. Edna Bowen Newton, the daughter of George Bowen, remembered some of the visitors to their cottage, including Booker T. Washington, educator and founder of Tuskegee Institute in Alabama; Paul Robeson, singer and actor; and poets Langston Hughes and Paul Lawrence Dunbar. Mrs. Newton also recalled stories about the Civil War told by Lewis Douglass, another son of Frederick Douglass, and his work as a printer of his father's famous abolitionist newspaper, The North Star.⁴

In 1926, the Bowen cottage was sold to Mrs. Anazine Flagg who operated "Anazine's Tea Room." She was the daughter of Whitfield McKinley who was appointed collector of the Port of Georgetown by President Theodore Roosevelt.

Mrs. Flagg recollected that patrons came from New York, Boston, North Carolina, Philadelphia and Arkansas. In her words, "Everyone wanted to come to Highland Beach. It was known to represent the best in Negro life." Paul Robeson, an world famous singer and actor, once visited Anazine's Tea Room and without pressure from other guests rose from his seat on the veranda and sang a spiritual which as Mrs. Flagg remembers, "reverberated out over the Chesapeake, and the waters of the bay stood still."⁵

Mrs. Flagg's father, Whitfield McKinley, sold a lot in Highland Beach to Paul Lawrence Dunbar, the famous poet. Mrs. Edna Bowen Newton recalls hearing Dunbar recite poetry on the beach one summer to residents gathered around a bonfire. Dunbar died in 1906 at the early age of 34.

In 1915, Dr. Mary Church Terrell, educator, civil libertarian and author of A Colored Woman in a White World, and her husband Robert Terrell, the first black-American municipal judge in Washington, D.C. (1910), built a cottage adjacent to Frederick Douglass' cottage, then occupied by Joseph and Fannie Douglass. One of their daughters, Mrs. Phyllis Terrell Langston made Highland Beach her permanent residence, serving as postmaster until her recent death.⁶

At the death of Major Douglass in 1921, the responsibility of maintaining the spirit and traditions of Highland Beach were passed to his son, Haley Douglass. The remaining lots in Highland Beach held by Charles Douglass were bequeathed to his sons Haley and Joseph. Haley Douglass emerged as the community leader.

In 1922, the residents incorporated the town. Highland Beach is the only incorporated jurisdiction in Anne Arundel County outside of Annapolis. Haley Douglass long served as a commissioner and mayor. Mrs. Anazine Flagg recalled that Haley Douglass "really loved the place and could have sold major portions to racketeers many times, but he didn't, and he died a poor man."⁷

Other important early residents were Dr. Johnny Washington, a dentist, artist and collector of Lincolniana and Dr. William Wells, an assistant professor of pathology at Howard University. They are representative of the summer residents at Highland Beach.

RESOURCE HISTORY:

The Douglass Summer House was built between 1894-1895 for Frederick Douglass the famed black humanitarian, orator and writer. It is one of the first two cottages built in Highland Beach, an exclusive resort for wealthy blacks established in 1893 by Douglass' son, Major Charles Douglass.

Tradition maintains that Frederick Douglass designed the house, specifically the second floor balcony facing the Chesapeake Bay, "so that I as a free man could look across the Bay to the Eastern Shore where I was born a slave." However, Douglass did not live to see it completed; he died unexpectedly in February 1895. Although bequeathed to his grandson, Joseph H. Douglass, the house was occupied for the first time in the summer of 1895 by Lewis Douglass, another son of Frederick Douglass. It remained in the Douglass family until it was sold in 1986 to the present owners, Mr. & Mrs. Charles H. Bohl.

Frederick Douglass was born in 1817 as Frederick Bailey, a slave in Talbot County, Maryland. He fled to freedom, becoming a leader in the abolition of slavery and worldwide oppression. As editor of the abolitionist newspaper, The North Star, Douglass used the slogan: "Right is of no sex - Truth is of no color - God is the Father of All, and we are all Brethren." Abraham Lincoln described Douglass as "the most meritorious person I have ever seen." During the summer of 1863 Douglass was successful in convincing President Lincoln to enlist black men as soldiers in the Union Army. His own sons, Lewis and Charles, joined the newly formed 54th Massachusetts Colored Regiment (the topic of the film Glory). His other son, Frederick, Jr., recruited black men in the Mississippi River Valley. Some 186,000 black Americans served in the Grand Army of the Republic, including six regiments from Maryland.⁸

At his death in 1895, Douglass' cottage at Highland Beach was bequeathed to his grandson, Joseph H. Douglass. However, Frederick's son, Lewis Douglass, and his family occupied the house at first until 1908 when Joseph and his wife Fannie Douglass began summering there. Mrs. Edna Bowen Newton, who spent summers at her father's cottage nearby on Douglass Avenue, recalled hearing Lewis Douglass relate stories of the Civil War and of his days as a printer for his father's newspaper The North Star.

The tenure of Joseph and Fannie Douglass at the Douglass Summer House began after their marriage in 1906. Although it has not been documented, it is assumed that Joseph and Fannie maintained the tradition of his father, and other residents, of opening his house to visitors at Highland Beach. Joseph Douglass was a concert violinist, travelling and performing extensively. Frederick Douglass had bequeathed his own violin to Joseph. Fannie Howard Douglass was an Atlanta belle and music teacher when she met her husband. Fannie became a well-known and loved resident of Highland Beach serving as postmaster for many years. She out-lived Joseph by some 50 years and at her death at the age of 101, the summer house passed to their daughter Nettie Douglass Morris. The present owners, Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Bohl, acquired the property in 1986.

Several pieces of Douglass family memorabilia have remained with the house, including an upright piano that belonged to Fannie Douglass, a Mission Oak dining table and buffet, a desk, and a photograph of Frederick Douglass inscribed "From Father to Son, taken in Boston, 1894."

Resource Analysis:

Built in 1894-1895 for Frederick Douglass, The Douglass Summer House is significant for its association with the unique development of Highland Beach, an exclusive black resort community founded by Frederick Douglass' son, Major Charles Douglass. With the financial backing of Frederick Douglass, Major Douglass laid out the town naming the streets for prominent Reconstruction-era friends of his father such as Langston and Wayman avenues. Early residents and regular visitors included such notables as Booker T. Washington, Paul Robeson, and Paul Lawrence Dunbar. The first two cottages built were those for Major Douglass in 1894 and Frederick Douglass in 1894-1895. Unfortunately, the Major Douglass house is no longer standing. The cottage built for Frederick Douglass is the property being nominated. Although Frederick Douglass did not live to see the cottage completed, its significance is in no way diminished. As founders and long-time residents of Highland Beach, the Douglass family has left an indelible mark on the region.

The Douglass Summer House is symbolically and visually the cornerstone of Highland Beach. It was one of the first four cottages to be built, and architecturally it is one of the most ornate. The majority of cottages are bungalows. Two of the more significant cottages are the Dr. "Johnny" Washington Cottage which displays some Queen Anne style characteristics and the Bowen Cottage, a two-story frame cross-gable cottage.

The survival of the Douglass Summer House (with considerable architectural integrity) as one of the earliest cottages at Highland Beach, its association with the Douglass family, and its integral relationship to Highland Beach, a unique community in American cultural history, make the Douglas Summer House eminently qualified for listing in the National Register of Historic Places.
