The Ducktown Historic District is a mix of residential and commercial buildings which date from between about 1900 and 1940. The residential buildings are primarily one story frame buildings, constructed between 1900 and 1920. They reflect simplified versions of the styles popular at the time, including the Colonial Revival and Bungalow. The plans for most of the dwellings are hall and parlor or pyramid cottage, which reflects the 19th century building traditions of the area.

Most of the commercial buildings are from a later date and are of masonry construction. There were a few brick commercial buildings constructed before 1920, these tend to use stone for decorative detailing in cornices and lintels. There is one surviving frame commercial building from between 1900 and 1920.

The term commercial style is used in the inventory to mean simple brick buildings with no decorative detailing except corbeled brick cornices. Most commercial buildings were built after circa 1920, although two were built circa 1900 and 1910 (#31, #43).

The Ducktown Historic District, in Ducktown, Polk County, Tennessee is significant to the history and development of the Basin for its importance in the commercial and industrial development of the city. It is eligible for the National Register under criterion A for its significance in commerce, and for its association with the development of the copper mining industry.

Ducktown began developing in the 1850s, as the town of Hiwassee, when the mining of copper began. It was located near the Hiwassee mine, and workers at that mine lived in the town. When the first phase of mining ended the buildings in the area were vacated as people left the Basin, or began to farm.

Ducktown did not develop randomly, in 1864, E. Muller, who worked for the Union Consolidated Mining Company, planned the growth of the community, the original plan was updated in 1878, and showed the owners of the property in Ducktown. Ducktown is the only example, in Polk County, of a community which was not owned by an industry and developed according to a plan.

The buildings stood vacant for 20 years until the Burra Burra Mine (NR 3/17/83) opened near the site of the Hiwassee Mine. People came in to work the Burra Burra and moved back into the district. Many of the original houses were so deteriorated that they were uninhabitable, so they were razed and new houses built. Because of this many houses in the district were constructed between 1900 and 1910.

Many of the mine officials, and workers lived in the Ducktown Historic District, as did people who made their living indirectly from the mines. There were bankers, lawyers, doctors and teachers living in the community. A hospital (site #24) was opened by the Tennessee Copper Company around 1900, and at least two doctors were in Ducktown at that time.

Ducktown's commercial buildings are mixed with residential buildings. The extant commercial buildings are mostly brick, because a city ordinance, around 1920, required that commercial buildings be brick. All the merchants in Ducktown historically located on the west side of Main Street, by 1930 the entire area had been developed.

Ducktown's commercial area was prosperous throughout the first and second phase of mining development. The company store was located in the area (site # 44). The Ducktown Banking Company (site #43) began in 1904, and became the longest continually operating bank in the basin (circa 1980 it moved into the commissary building). The Kimsey Pharmacy (site #41) was run by the two Kimsey brothers, who were also doctors in the Basin between 1900 and 1950.

Commercially Ducktown served as the center of operations in the northern part of the Basin. Many residents of Isabella, as well as farmers from the northern part of the Basin and from outside the Basin would come to Ducktown to shop, because it was the nearest city.

The district meets the registration requirements for residential historic districts found in the Historic Resources of the Tennessee Copper Basin Multiple Property Documentation Form for its significance in industry, commerce, and community planning and development.
