DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The windmill stands on the former Frederic Eronson property, "Verna Farm." It was erected in (1893-94) by a company carrying the following Letterhead: "The Corcoran Storm-Defying Lindmills. Pumps and Eater Supply Materials. Lindmills for Export. No. 11 John Street, New York. Factory, Jersey City, H.J." The Bronson windmill with its large wooden tank in the 80-foot tower and underground cisters, was the principal water source for the large dairy farm and great mansion designed by Richard Morris Hunt in 1891. The shingle windmill with its ogee-shaped roof may well be the finest remaining example of this unique type of American agricultural engincering. No changes of any kind have been made to the building.

Eugincenue fluord The Historic American, Buildings Survey in May, 1971, made measured drawings and photographs.

A letter of specifications to Ur. Pronson from Andrew J. Corcoran, dated November 9, 1894, shows that the tower was constructed of "good ouality Georgia pine" to a height above ground line of "not less than seventy five foet." The octagonal plan occupies a square of 174 feet at the ground. Eight deadmen or anchors of locust wood were buried six feet deep and joined by heavy iron rods to cast iron fittings at the eight corners of the tower base. This bracing of the structure is now only partially effective since the whole has settled over the years and the fastenings to the main posts have lost their original bearing. Framing of the tower is given in great detail in the letter cited. It is work of high quality, using heavy timbers thoroughly braced and carefully spliced where necessary with ironwork of similar grade. The excellence of construction is attested to by the comparatively small amount of deterioration evident to a casual inspection of the upper framing, even though breaks in the sheathing and uncovered window openings have admitted the weather for an indefinite span of years. Hore serious deterioration, however, is apparent near ground level, where it is to be expected and where the sills and the ends of main posts will probably require considerable repair. The aforementioned settling of the tower is evidence of this.

Horizontal sheatding covers the framing up to the eaves and is then finished with shingles of uniform width in "fish scale" pattern - the butts saved in a curve or arc. Squared shingles are applied to the roof. Move this is a circular gallery with railing, now semi-ruinous, from which rises the four-sided tapering timberwork with an octagonal gallery or platform midway, thoroughly cross-braced, which supports the axle, crank, and metalwork of the wheel and the tail or rudder which formerly caught the power of the wind. The wooden blades framed in sections have been stored in generally good condition in the lower floor of the tower. Mearly all of the wooden tail slats have disappeared, but enough may remain to guide a restoration. A windlass with its connecting wire, for feathering or turning the wheel away from the wind to stop operation of the mill, remains at one of the lower floors within the tower, as does the greater part of the pumping machinery at ground level and the pitnan rods for linkage to the crank on the wheel axle. STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Bronson windmill is the last in Fairfield, Connecticut, of many former majestic windmills which once were a familiar sight on the horizon and an important source of water. These unique symbols of our forebears' achievements are a trust we must preserve for future generations. The study of the drilling of this "first deepdriven well in the area" and the building of the 80-foot shingle-covered tower with its tank, underground cistern, and pumping machinery could be a fascinating and useful study in agriculture, conservation, and engineering.

Vorna was the 18th century home site of Timothy Dwight, who became president of Yale College in 1795. The following year the property was bought by Dr. Isaac Bronson. It was the grandson of Isaac Bronson, Frederic Bronson II, financier, who rebuilt Verna, which became a new three-story mansion with extensive grounds and a farm with an excellent and renowmed herd of Jersey cattle. The estate was large - two to three hundred acres - and needed nore water than could be obtained from rainfall. The first deep-drilled well in the area was dug here and the windmill was erected in 1893-94. It was built on the same large scale as that of the house and was much noticed.

The mill is one of the few local vestiges of the engineering of the 19th century. Letters detailing the method of construction as well as all the measurements of the parts are available for the restoration of the structure, which is expected to begin before snowfall of this year.
