Describe present and historic physical appearance.

The Anna Brash house faces west on a flat lot facing Buena Vista street. Set at the southwest corner of the lot, there is a generous north side yard, and east back yard with two outbuildings in the northeast corner. There are some small trees and foundation planting, but the landscaping is not of note.

The house is a simple gable-ended structure running east and west, with a rather highly developed front facade. The house is clad with weatherboards and corner boards above a water table and bottom fascia. It sits about three feet or more above grade on brick piers, the spaces between the piers covered with open-work brick on the front porch.

The simply pitching roof is penetrated by a nicely corbelled-top brick chimney on the outside wall towards the center of the south side. The roof projects out moderately at the side eaves. The fascia on the side walls under the eaves continues out to become the front fascia of the porch soffit beam, and the boxing of the eaves runs horizontally across the front of the gable. The verges of the gable repeat the thin, moderately projecting eaves, and the front surface of the gable has a fascia at the verges, and is weatherboarded. A later pair of one-over-one double-hung sash separated by mullions are centered on the gable. Below is a later thin balcony of turned spindles, its floor below the sill level of the sash.

The three-bay porch is supported by square section posts with a high length at the bottom supporting a railing of turned balusters, a length at the top with delicate jigsaw brackets resembling butterfly wings, and with three equal square-sectioned elements the rest of the shaft, these sections separated from each other and the top and bottom square lengths by recessed turnings.

Access to the wood floored porch is up steps, with no handrail, at the north end of the porch, leading directly to the front door, which is a large framed opening with a single-acting door with a top glass pane and lower decorative wood panel, the door set below a two-light transom. Next to a mullion each side of the door bay are three-light side-light sash with wood panels below the full height of the frame. To the south are two full-length two-over-four double-hung sash with louvered blinds. All three openings have a small molding capping the top of the trim, the door opening frame being a little higher than the window frames.

On the south side there are, going east, spaced irregularly, five typical two-over-two window sash, the center opening being two sash with a muntin set in one frame. None have blinds.

The Brash house is a side-hall cottage. The hall is on the north side of the house, and has an L-shaped stair with turned wood newel post, turned wood banisters, and open stringer. The wall separating the hall from the street-facing living room has been removed. The living room is backed by a bathroom, then a bedroom. Across the rear, backing up to the hall and bedroom, is the den, which was originally the kitchen. The present kitchen was added during the 1920s. The typical interior door has five panels, no transom, and a casing comprised of a flat board with molded backband. The base is elaborately detailed, but the cornice is fairly restrained. Walls and ceilings are of wood boards, but covered with Celetex.

In the northeast corner of the lot is a non-contributing wood frame grage with gable roof, wood siding, and sliding garage doors. There are no visible windows. South of the garage is a small, non-contributing, prefabricated fiberglass greenhouse.

State significance of property, and justify criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above.

802 Buena Vista is architecturally significant within the context of Pascagoula's residential elements, as one of only a few surviving historic side-hall cottages in the city. It is also significant as the home of Anna C. Brash, widow of the lighthouse keeper of Horn Island, relating it to the area's maritime context.

A previous house on this site, built in 1889 by Hans Grandahl, was destroyed by fire. Before her marriage, Mrs. Brash acquired the property in 1900 from W.O. Clark, manager of J.H. Menge & Sons, and erected the present house. She later married Brash, who was keeper of the Horn Island lighthouse, which began operation on May 23, 1874. The house stayed in the Brash family until 1960 when it was sold to Doris Stringer. Other owners include Alfred A. Frank, 1965; David Hanafourda, 1977; Michael J. Heidelberg, 1978, and Paul W. Hines, 1981.

The house dates from the period when East Pascagoula was a separate community, noted for its resort industry and port activity. The house is one of only a few surviving shotguns in Pascagoula, a house type which once was prolific in the community (see cover nomination). The porch details are particularly well executed, and were made possible because of the area's lumber industry.
