Exterior: The Octagon House, constructed in 1859, is considered to be the first concrete house built in South Carolina. This eight-sided structure with hipped roof has four porches and four extended rooms on the first-floor level and a central octagonal core for the second-floor level. The octagonal design is maintained throughout, even down to eight-sided porch columns and chimneys. The only alterations to the exterior have been a rather crudely performed lowering of the roof line of the two first-floor rooms flanking the front porch. Window design and placement varies in each facade, but all have granite sills and lintels. Projecting eaves of the first-floor shed roofs are covered but unadorned while those around the second-story roof have boxed cornices. The upper roof is crowned by a large square skylight which illuminates the interior central hall of both floors.

Interior: The octagonal motif that is so prominant on the exterior is muted inside the house. Square rooms were constructed within the octagonal central core by including triangular closets in the interior design. front and central hall are located on the first floor, the latter of which is open through the second story to the skylight. Surrounding the front and central halls are three rooms and a kitchen. A curved stairway rises from the right of the front hall to the second story interior balconyhallway. A steeper rear stairway also leads to the second floor from the kitchen on the first floor. Originally, five bedrooms and one bath surounded the central open hall on the second floor, but all bedrooms have been partitioned, thus doubling their number. Fireplaces are located in all rooms and were placed on any wall desired since the entire structure is of concrete. Below the first floor are basement rooms with outside access only. Most of these rooms were originally used as domestic slave quarters, but one small one built entirely of field stone served as an ice house and collection point for moisture which accumulated in the concrete walls and was transferred to this location by a series of drain pipes.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Structural Significance: The Octagon House displays several interesting architectural features, but its primary significance is the early appearance of the method of construction utilized by the designer and builder, Zelotes Lee Holmes, a Presbyterian minister and educator of up-country South Carolina. The son of the Reverend Mr. Holmes, Nickles J. Holmes, provides an excellent account of the building procedures in his Life Sketches and Sermons: "My parents had a large plantation in the country, and some 50 to 60 slaves... When I was 12 years old (1859), my father, having been elected Professor of the Laurensville Female College, moved up to Laurens and built a large, twelve room, concrete house... This concrete house that my father built was, I think, the first of the kind in the state. The walls were thick, made of lime, cement, sand, and crushed rock, put in between planks and in this state mortar poured over the rock and allowed to dry, and then the planks removed. It was built by his own slaves mainly, not only carpenters but field hands and even children in the yard, from thirteen or fourteen years old; including myself, carrying mortar in paint kegs on gang planks. My father planned it and superintended all the work himself. He had the large rock for the foundation split out in the quarry, and hauled the flint rock from the fields around and had them crushed with sledge hammers." The imprint of the wooden frames can still be seen in the walls of the basement. walls are from 12 to 15 inches thick and include hollow passages which provide a cooling ventilation system throughout the house. Though many technical improvements have since been made, the basic system of concrete construction herein employed is essentially the same as that used today. As one of the first concrete houses in South Carolina, the Octagon House stands as a landmark to a structural technique that did not fully mature in the state until the 20th century.
