The Albany Passenger Terminal Station, built shortly before 1910, is located at the end of an open brick plaza at the dead end of Front Street.

The depot, as it is most commonly called, is a long, low hip roofed structure of dark red brick and wide, overhanging eaves. The building is actually composed of 3 sections. The two large waiting rooms, ticket offices, and restroom areas are contained in the center building. A large baggage room is separated from the main station by a wide covered passengeway; and on the opposing south side of the waiting room is a covered passageway leading to a separate building once used as a restaurant. Extensive umbrella sheds cover the concrete platforms along the tracks.

In detail the front facade of the depot is that of a solid brick wall defined by groups of long narrow beveled edge glass windows between the double door entrance areas with flat bracketed roofs supported by brick piers.

The train tracks run north and southeast of the paved area that sets the depot in a Renaissance plaza type setting.

The Albany Passenger Terminal or Depot was opened in 1910 as a result of the increased railroad usage that made Albany a major southwest Georgia city. Even the building's architecture with its progressive Wrightian prairie school design approach, bespeaks of the forward moving actions of early 20th century Albany. The increased construction of railroad lines to Albany brought a new era of more dependable transportation which drew southwest Georgia into closer contact with the world and a quicker development of the region.

By Circa 1900 seven railroads including the Atlantic and Gulf, an extension of the Southwestern Railroad, the Albany and Northern, the Columbus Southern and the Georgia Northearn Railroad were coming into Albany. As many as 35 passenger trains came through Albany daily. Just before World War II, several luxury trains including the Flamingo, Dixie Flyer and Seminole passed through Albany, coming directly from Chicago enroute to Miami. This passenger terminal served the city of Albany for over sixty years the last passenger train leaving Albany on May 1, 1971.

As for the architectural qualities of the Albany Passenger terminal, the building serves, even more than the railroad history, in recording the significance of Albany's progressive state during the early 20th century by its innovative use of the Prairie school design. The emphasis on the horizontal by low hipped rooflines, the use of ribbon windows, and massive rectangular porch piers are principle characteristics of the Prairie style the style which Frank Lloyd Wright first used in residential architecture in 1900 - less than ten years before the Terminal Station's construction. To have translated the stylistic qualities from residential to commercial use, from the mid west to southwest Georgia in less than ten years is especially significant. Although extensive research has not produced the name of the designing architect for the Albany depot, surely one of sophistication and keen awareness was responsible for this design.

The passenger Terminal is the last remaining vestige of Albany's passenger railroad service and with its importance architecturally and to the area's economic development, it is worthy of recognition and preservation. Presently the building is unoccupied but plans have been proposed for its adaptive use when funding becomes available.
