7. Description

Architectural Classification:

Colonial Revival

Materials:

foundation	brick
walls	brick
roof	metal
other	marble (entrance steps)

Description of present and historic physical appearance:

The former United States Post Office is located at the intersection of South Main (U.S. Highway 301) and Vine Streets in downtown Statesboro, Bulloch County, Georgia. The building is south of the county courthouse and the central business district and west of the East Vine Street Warehouse and Depot District (which is also being nominated as part of the Statesboro multiple property listing).

The painted brick structure was constructed in 1917-1918 and exhibits the influence of the Colonial Revival style of architecture. The rectangular building features a symmetrical facade, a balustrade along the parapet, and a central portico with a pediment and a fanlight above the front doors. Other decorative details to the main entrance include festoons, Doric columns, and pilasters. Each facade features a central Palladian window and six-over-six double-hung windows with keystones and shutters.

The current floor plan includes a large central lobby surrounded by offices and meeting rooms of various sizes. Exterior steps on the south facade lead to the basement which is divided into four offices. Other interior features include plaster walls, crown molding, and marble baseboards in the lobby.

Landscaping around the former post office building includes a large oak tree on the northwest corner of the lot and low shrubs on both the north and west sides of the building. The remainder of the lot is occupied by driveways and parking lot.

Alterations to the structure have occurred since the city purchased the building in 1964 for use as a municipal office building; these include painting the exterior brick walls, adding shutters to the windows, and constructing a wheel chair ramp and a drive-through window. Alterations to the interior were extensive to allow for the change from post office to city hall. All but three of the interior partitions are modern additions. Although the building has been altered for use as the Statesboro City Hall, it has retained integrity of overall design (especially on the exterior), workmanship, materials, location, and feeling and stands as a rare example of Colonial Revival architecture in Statesboro.

Significance of property, justification of criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above:

Narrative statement of significance (areas of significance)

The U. S. Post Office (former), located on South Main street in Statesboro, is eligible for listing on the National Register of Historic Places under criteria A and C as a part of the Statesboro multiple property listing. Nomination of this building is supported by significance in the areas of communications and architecture.

This building is important for its contribution to communications for the city of Statesboro. At the end of the Civil War American communities generally remained islands unto themselves, but thereafter the impact of railroads, telegraphs, and other new communications technologies helped bind the nation together, end local isolation, and standardize taste and behavior. Postal service was a significant mode of communication for small towns prior to the ubiquity of the telephone and the mass-communication provided by movies, radio, and finally television. The U. S. Postal Service was an important means of bringing information and new ideas to Statesboro and of linking the growing city with the outside world. This building, built near the end of Statesboro's period of pronounced growth and development, reflects the intensity of that growth and development and the pressures for enhanced postal service which it would have engendered. It is Statesboro's only extant historic postal building, representing the unseen, almost taken-for-granted role that postal communications played in the early 20th century in the city.

In terms of architecture, the building is significant for its Colonial Revival design. Statesboro's early 20th-century post office was constructed as a result of the 1913 Public Buildings Act. This Act set standards which affected the construction of public buildings through the 1920s. Standards for small town post offices dictated that the new buildings should be "ordinary" and of the same class as real estate in the town. Frequently, the same plans would be used for several structures and rarely were outside architects hired. At the time the post office was constructed, J. A. Wetmore was the Acting Supervising Architect from the Treasury Department with C. E. Parker as Supervision Architect on the site. This building was influenced by the federal government's turn to Classical and Colonial architecture in the 1910s. Symmetrical facades, the central entrance with portico, the pediment, balustrade, doric columns, and pilasters are all evidence of the Colonial Revival style. It is the largest and most prominent Colonial Revival building in Statesboro and marked a clear break with the community's Victorian architectural traditions.

Section 8

National Register Criteria

Because of the U.S. Post Office's role in the history of communications in early 20th-century Statesboro, this building meets National Register criteria A. Because of its Colonial Revival design, which was common to public buildings constructed during the 1910s and 1920s although uncommon in Statesboro, the structure meets National Register criteria C.
