Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The overall form of this house has been changed little over the years, especially on the east elevation or streetfront side. The only modifications have been the enclosure of the porches on the south and west sides. The house was originally a two-story, rectangular block with a hipped roof. The streetfront facade consists of three bays: the left-side bay has double hung windows on both floors; the central bay has a doorway with sidelights on the ground floor, a similar situation on the second floor, and a dormer with three double hung windows above; the right-side bay has bow-window/walls on both floors and is crowned by a gable with a small, round-headed window. A trabeated porch projects across the streetfront facade and connects to a one-story "turret" or pavillion at the southeast corner. At the rear or west elevation, the kitchen wing is only one story high. A two-story rear gable has been modified as porches below have been enclosed. An original porch on the south side has also been enclosed. Exterior materials consist of brick piers and foundation walls and clapboard siding throughout. Windows are typically one-over-one double-hung sash.

The original plan consisted of a central hall, running east-west, featuring columns supporting an entablature, this ensemble enframing a stair which ascends through six risers to a landing and then returns to the second floor. To the south side of this hall are two identical rooms with fireplaces having mantles showing Colonial Revival details such as colonnetes and swags. To the north side of the hall a large space is divided only by a framed opening. The eastern portion of this space, facing the street, has a large bow-window/wall projection; the western portion of this large space was originally a dining room, and also has a bow-window/wall, in this case projecting to the north. Both of these spaces have fireplaces with mantles showing Colonial Revival details. A kitchen connects to the dining room space and projects back to the west. Stairs, the hall entablature, doors, door frames, windows, window frames, wainscots, and floors are oak throughout on the first floor. The exception is the northeast room which features maple. Fireplaces have been infilled with polychrome ceramic tiles when the fireplaces were converted from wood to coal burning. The two rooms to the south side of the hall have vertical beaded wall paneling. The enclosed porch spaces to the south and west sides have twentieth century interior finishes. Upstairs, the two rooms to either side of the central hall have pine floors and trim and are simply detailed.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Queen Anne Style was popular in the latter decades of the nineteenth century. It featured complex and asymmetrical massing and multiple textures and colors combined to form, what was often called at the time, "free-classic" architecture. After 1876 and the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, Americans began to look more closely at their colonial past, including their colonial architecture. The result was the Colonial Revival Style which, reaching maturation after 1900, employed features from the New England Colonial, Dutch Colonial, Southern Colonial, Georgian, and Federal eras, often mixed, and often oversized. Textures became less varied and polychromy gave way to white painted wood and to brick.

The significance of the Magruder-Newsom House lies in its Colonial Revival Style features, features which are uncommon in Starkville where this building is one of only a very few large Colonial Revival Style structures left intact and not significantly modified. Throughout, the building's plan type, overall massing, and architectural details reflect the turn-of-the-century taste for things American. Architectural features of particular note are the "turret" or pavillion located at the southeast corner of the structure, the bow-window/walls on the east and north facades, the fine mantles, and the maple woodwork in the northeast parlor on the ground floor.
