Huey, Thomas, Farm
(Historic Resources of Boone County, Kentucky)

Description

The Thomas Huey Farm (BE-1033) is a 1.75-acre parcel consisting of a two-story vernacular Gothic Revival-style brick residence, a vernacular brick slave house, an early twentieth-century dairy barn, and a stone fence. With reference to the Multiple Property Documentation Form, "Historic Resources of Boone County, Kentucky," the Huey House represents Property Type 1E, domestic architecture/central-passage double-pile house, the slave quarters is an example of Property Type IIF, domestic outbuildings/tenant house, the barn represents Property Type II, domestic outbuildings, and the fence represents Property Type III, rock fences.

The Huey house (Photo 1, 2, and 3) is an L-shaped painted brick residence of one-and-one-half stories, set on a stone foundation and capped with an intersecting gable roof system clad in asphalt shingles. The three-bay facade incorporates a centered entrance with a single-paneled wood door enframed by Greek Revival-style three-light sidelights and a transom assembly which includes stylized Italianate bracketry (Photo 4). Most fenestration is flat-topped, six-over-six lights, with exterior operable louvered shutters. An open porch, with supports which likely date from the 1920s, extends across the facade (Photo 1). Centered on the facade is a second-story gable with a distinctive lancet-arched window with curvilinear Gothic tracery (Photo 5). The eaves of the house are trimmed with a dentil band. The east side of the house, in the angle of the ell, includes an open porch of modest proportions, constructed in recent years; due to its location on a secondary elevation, it does not detract substantially from the otherwise high integrity of the house. Chimneys punctuate the roof line of the house at several points.

The interior of the Thomas Huey House has been altered only minimally over time. It retains the broad central hall which is characteristic of the central-passage double-pile plan. An unusual design feature of the house is its main stair, which, rather than leading upward from the area immediately inside the front door, instead curves to the second story from the rear of the hall (Photo 6). The interior retains much of its original trim, incorporating high baseboards and molded door and window trim, with paneled aprons beneath the windows (Photo 7). Most doors are four-panel in form, with the openings finished with simple entablatures. Interior rooms generally have their original fireplaces and Classical Revival-style mantles of wood.

Immediately to the south of the house is a one-story tenant house which is said to have been used as slave quarters in ante-bellum Kentucky (Photo 8). This building is rectilinear in form with a laterally-oriented gable roof and a facade of two bays. Windows on the slave house are flat-topped and are devoid of any architectural ornament.

Northeast of the house is a deteriorated early twentieth-century English barn of timber frame construction (Photo 9). The barn served as a dairy barn during the years that the farm was involved with milk production.

The house and dependencies are at the end of a lane which leads eastward from Big-Bone Road. At the entrance to the lane are two square stone pillars, constructed of fieldstone and connected to a rock wall which extends along much of the property's Big Bone Road frontage (Photo 10). The pillars and rock wall are considered to be a single contributing object within the context of the nomination. The balance of the nominated acreage consists of agricultural fields between the barn and Big Bone Road, all of which were

Significance

The Thomas Huey Farm (BE-1033) is significant under National Register Criterion C, for its architectural design, incorporating the physical qualities of a nineteenth-century Boone County farmstead anchored by a principal house and buttressed by slave quarters and agricultural dependencies. The property is significant within Historic Contexts I, IV, V, and VII, "Settlement, Socioeconomic Growth, and Maturity of Boone County, 1789-1950," "Agriculture in Boone County, 1789-1950," "Domestic Architecture in Boone County, 1789-1950," and "Boone County Ethnic Heritage, 1789-1950" respectively. The house and its dependencies satisfy the Registration Requirements for Property Type I and II resources as set forth in Section F of the Boone County MPDF.

The house was built for Thomas Huey, the sixth child of Samuel and Jane Mason Huey and a member of a prominent farming family in nineteenth-century Boone County. Samuel Huey emigrated to Kentucky after his birth in Pennsylvania and childhood in Virginia. Upon arriving in Kentucky about 1800, he settled at Landing Springs, near Big Bone. His son, Thomas, was born in 1805, married Elvira Garnett in 1831, and began acquiring property in this area in 1834, significantly adding to his holdings over the next fifteen years. Thomas and Elvira Huey reared their seven children from this farm. Thomas Huey's will, prepared in 1875, included many bequests of land, which in the aggregate totaled more than 1,500 acres, making this one of the largest farms in the county. He left his home and the immediately-adjacent acreage to his son Thomas Addison Huey (known as Addison or "Add," and shown on the 1878 atlas map as "T. A." [See Fig. 1]). T. A., wed Mary Alice Miller, the daughter of another prominent Big Bone area family, and lived on the property until his death in 1923; his wife remained until her own death seven years later. Land records indicate that their sons, James W. and T. A., Jr., sold the property in 1933, although a 1952 newspaper account mentioned that James W. Huey and his wife, Mamie, lived at that time on a part of the Huey farm; exactly which part cannot be confirmed. The present owner received the property as part of her divorce settlement from Tommy Huey Ryle.

The several generations of Hueys constituted an important early Boone County family whose prominence is indicated by the fact that the crossroads settlement, located about two miles to the north, at the corner of present-day Big Bone Road and Hathaway Road, bears the name, Huey's Corners.

Architecturally, the Thomas Huey House was planned with an eye toward the eclecticism which characterized much of mid- and late-nineteenth-century nineteenth-century design. It is basically a vernacular, central-passage, double-pile residence with a rear ell. Its formal features include the main entrance, with sidelights and transom borrowed directly from the Greek Revival. On the simple pilasters of the entry are brackets which suggest one of the hallmarks of the Italianate style of the later nineteenth century. Capping the facade, the focal point of a center gable is a lancet-arched window with curvilinear tracery, clearly a feature of the Gothic Revival style.
