Forrester House
1103 Evergreen Road, Anchorage

Significance

Designed in the Colonial Revival mode, this two-story weatherboard structure draws upon a variety of elements characteristic of this turn-of-the-century style. Local contractor William B. Wood popularized the Colonial Revival style in Anchorage, and this house may have been the work of Henry Frank who earlier served as an apprentice to Wood. Wood and Frank were responsible for the construction of numerous houses in Anchorage using Colonial Revival motifs during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. In the early 1900s Anchorage was transformed from a summer community to a year-round residential community when the interurban line was extended to the village. This fine Colonial Revival residence remains unaltered within its verdant setting.

Boundary Description

The boundary of the Forrester house site comprises Lot 40 of County Block 23, and contains 2.2 acres. The nominated site includes the house. There are no significant outbuildings.

Revised Statement of Significance

The Forrester house is a good example of an "American Foursquare" structure with Colonial Revival details. It is a significant element in the architectural continuum in Jefferson County.

Development of the Colonial Revival and Neo-Colonial styles in Jefferson County coincided with similar architectural trends elsewhere in the late 1890s and early 1900s. While never built in great numbers in the rural areas of Jefferson County, scattered examples of these styles are to be found in the Jefferson County MRA, predominantly in the eastern and northeastern suburban areas. These examples include grand Neo-Georgian and Neo-Colonial mansions (JF-531, Lincliff; JF 551, C.T. Ballard house-NR Aug. 1983) as well as more modest structures (JF-567, Alex G. Robinson house, Nitta Yuma District-NR Feb. 1983; JF 655, Henry Frank House-NR Dec. 1980) and much simpler adaptations of these styles (JF 621, Bonavita-Weller house; JF 608, Hausgen house-NR July 1983; JF 609, Wills House-NR Dec. 1980).

The Forrester house can be placed in that group of houses which exhibited Neo-Colonial or Colonial Revival influence in a simpler practical form by the addition of details indicative of these styles. The Forrester house, built in the village of Anchorage in 1908, was probably derived from the earlier (1898) Hausgen house, (JF-608) built in Anchorage by the well-known contractor William B. Wood. Wood built many of the Colonial Revival houses in eastern Jefferson County at the turn of the century and, although it is not documented, may have also built the Forrester house and the Wills house (JF-609).

The Forrester house is a significant element in both the architectural development and suburban community expansion of the early 20th century in Jefferson County.
