DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (If known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

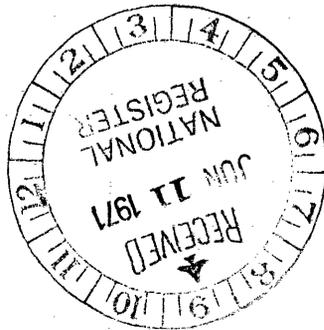

The original Chickasaw capitol (1855-58) is a log structure approximately 14 x 24 feet. The hand-hewn logs have been rechinked, the hip roof reshingled. Otherwise it appears today much as it did when it served the tribe as its first council house at Good Spring on Pennington Creek a few hundred yards west of its present location. Attached to the outside wall of the capitol, beside the front door, is the tree trunk that served as the tribal whipping post, a Chickasaw institution until statehood in 1907.

The third and last Chickasaw capitol (1896-1907) is a faintly Victorian, not unhandsome structure of gray, block granite from the "ten-acre-rock" quarry still in operation northwest of Tishomingo. It is a solid, three-story affair, approximately 50 feet square, with a crowning cupola. An inviting arched doorway on the south and paired, turret-like dormers on each side relieve the building's otherwise somewhat severe lines. But for some modernization on the second floor, which contains the courtroom, the courthouse is much the same as it was when used as seat of government for the Chickasaw Nation.

The log capitol is now enclosed in a strictly functional tile block building that the Oklahoma Historical Society is developing as a museum. It is open daily.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

SEE INSTRUCTIONS

In the 52 years it enjoyed complete independence in the conduct of tribal affairs, the Chickasaw Nation used three capitols. Two of these - the first and the last - still stand, side by side, in the Johnston county seat of Tishomingo. Together - as a museum and as county courthouse - they serve as an effective memorial to the last of the Five Civilized Tribes to migrate from the Southeast to present Oklahoma.

From the winter of 1838-1839, when they began moving west, until 1855, the Chickasaws were the somewhat reluctant sharers of southeastern Indian Territory with the Choctaws, who had come west some years earlier. Outnumbered better than three to one by the Choctaws, and relegated to the less developed section of the Choctaw Nation, the Chickasaws were soon demanding a nation of their own. In 1848 the tribe had its first formal written constitution. In 1855 a treaty signed at Washington defined the boundaries of the 4,707,903-acre Chickasaw Nation and granted the Chickasaws "the unrestricted right of self-government and full jurisdiction, over persons and property."

Tribal council grounds had been established some years earlier at Good Spring on Pennington Creek in what is now the western section of Tishomingo. Here in 1853 a hewn-log council house had been erected. This log structure became the Nation's first capitol in August 1857 when a mass convention elected Cyrus Harris the first tribal governor. The capitol became Tishomingo City in honor of Chief Tishomingo, the last Chickasaw war chief, in Mississippi.

A two-story, red brick capitol, with cupola and widow's walk, was completed in 1858 and the log capitol was moved to the Gov. Harris' nearby farm, where it was used for a time as a smokehouse. When the second capitol was destroyed by fire, a third and last was erected. It was first used in 1896. Since 1907, when Oklahoma became a state, it has served as Johnston County courthouse.

The log council house, meanwhile, was salvaged in the middle 1930s when it was brought back to town, placed on the courthouse grounds just west of the old capitol. In the 1960s it was moved again to a site immediately east of the courthouse, where it was carefully restored. In 1969 the Oklahoma Historical Society protected it with a cover building that now serves as a museum. Together the two Chickasaw capitols represent more than a century of growth and development of the tribe, as citizens of both the independent Chickasaw Nation and the State of Oklahoma.

✓ Johnston County Courthouse (Chickasaw National Capitol, listed in National Register on November 5, 1971)

Location: Capitol Avenue, Tishomingo, Oklahoma 40, Johnston County 069

Owner: Johnston County, Tishomingo, Oklahoma

Description: Condition: good, unaltered

The oldest structure currently in use as a county courthouse in Oklahoma, the Johnston county Courthouse was built in 1898 of rough-cut pink granite blocks. The building was originally the capitol of the Chickasaw Nation. The great seal of the Chickasaws is on one side of the cornerstone. The structure has attic gables and the overall style is influenced by Romanesque Revival architecture. The building has a metal cupola and a tin roof, all painted with galvanized paint. The tympanum areas of the gables are decorated with triangular metal inserts with a circular design. These inserts are also galvanized. The front entranceway is recessed and has a Roman arch supported by polished, yellow granite columns. The building has beaded mortar work. The original windows and doors have been replaced by modern ones.

Significance: 1898; Builder/architect: Unknown

The Johnston County Courthouse is particularly significant because of its role in the history of the Chickasaw Nation. Built as their capitol building in 1898, the Chickasaws sold the building to Johnston County in 1910. Since that time it has served the citizens of the area as the center of county government. The structure's unusual Romanesque design makes it unique among the state's courthouses. It is also the oldest courthouse in Oklahoma.
