DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

EXTERIOR

These two unoccupied one-story log houses, built before 1831 to house slaves, are almost identical in exterior dimensions. Both consist of one 20' x 17' room with a 20' x 6' front porch created by the overhanging roof. For convenience, these houses are designated House #1 and House #2. House #1 has a one-room clapboard addition in the rear. House #2 had three rooms added, but these additions were stripped when the house was moved in 1971. Each side of each house has a shuttered window, but a door has replaced a window in House #2. The front of each house has a pine board door and shuttered window, and the rear has one door. There are no ornamental exterior features on either house.

The walls of each house are built of hand-hewn, horizontally laid 4" x 9" long-leaf pine logs. There is some question whether a pit saw was used for some of the logs in House #2 because of horizontal lines on the logs. The corners of the walls are formed by precisely dovetailed logs. Most of the chinking between the logs is missing and some small boards have been nailed to the logs to add support. The logs themselves are in good condition, but the house is somewhat unsettled structurally.

The gable roofs of both houses are covered with sheets of metal. The rafters rest on 25' ceiling beams overhanging 6' in front and 1' in back. The roof of House #1 has been extended at a lesser slope to cover the back section. Gables of both houses are covered with unpainted clapboard. Both houses rest on hewn foundation beams, some of which are missing under House #2. The original foundation stones, or pillars, were abandoned when the houses were moved; the houses now rest on concrete block and brick supports. The front porch of House #1 is laid in pine planking on the foundation sills. The porch roof extension is supported by pine pillar posts which extend to the foundation sills. House #1 is missing some of the pillar posts, while House #2 is missing the entire porch structure.

INTERIOR

Both houses have open ceilings, revealing ceiling beams, rafters, laths, and cross-bracings on the rafters. Some of the rafters are supported by queen posts. The interior walls have the same hewn logs as the exterior walls. Posts supporting the ceiling beams are visible at the corners. Bare pine floor planks rest on half-hewn log sills. The windows and doors are simply framed with one-piece sills, posts, and jams.

Both houses are missing their 5' x 4' fireplaces, although the rough, unpainted mantelpieces remain. The pine board doors have hand-forged iron strap hinges attached to the frames with 6' spikes.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

SIGNIFICANCE

These two log houses were built before 1831 to house slaves on the Gregg Plantation near Florence, South Carolina. They were among seven houses of similar construction placed on opposite sides of a "street" leading to the plantation house. After the War Between the States the houses were moved to a different area of the same plantation, where the residents took up farming for wages and subsistence. The houses were occupied until 1950.

BLACK HISTORY

From 1820 to 1930, the majority of South Carolina's population were Blacks. Before the War Between the States, most of these Blacks lived as slaves on plantations. The "street" pattern for arranging houses was widely used. During Reconstruction the former slave houses continued to be used by their original occupants. Often these houses were moved from their original locations to form more autonomous communities, but the tenant and wage farmers occupying them continued to be partially dependent upon the plantation economy. Their lifestyles involved hunting, fishing, garden farming, livestock raising, and trades as well as plantation field work. Many of these former slave houses were continuously occupied through the middle of the twentieth century.

ARCHITECTURE

These former slave houses, originally almost duplicate in design, illustrate an early practice of mass production of unit dwellings. Much of the skilled labor in Southern plantation buildings was done by black craftsmen and artisans, using the same craftsmanship that went into elegant plantation owners' houses. The craftsmanship shown in these dovetailed, hewn logs is usually not attributed to work found in slave dwellings. These small houses incorporate many of the same architectural elements found in larger Southern houses. The open front porches covered by roof overhang and supported by pillar posts, the gable roofs, and rear additions are all typical of the region.

Slave Houses

7. DESCRIPTION cont.

SURROUNDINGS

These houses were built on the J. Eli Gregg plantation before 1831 to house slaves. They were in a group of seven houses placed on either side of a "street" leading to the plantation house. Before 1870, the houses were moved several hundred yards to form a new community. Occupied until the early 1950s, the houses were again moved in 1971 for the construction of the Francis Marion College Library. Their present location is actually nearer to their original site, near the old plantation house, which burned in the 1920s. The houses were never removed from the original plantation property, which is now largely owned by Francis Marion College. Today both houses stand in an uncultivated field at the edge of the woods.
