Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The central two-and-a-half story mass of the Dudley Jones home is essentially unchanged since its construction c. 1907/1908. Town historians place the construction after 1905 and before 1910, after they and the rest of the townspeople watched its predecessor burn. The new house apparently retained most of the Queen Anne features of the old, being frame construction set up on brick piers and fronted by double-level wrap-around porches. The porches have been replaced within the last 40 years by the rectangular, box-columned porch shown in Photo #1. The rectangular mass of the house is embellished by the multi-gabled, hipped roof, featuring projecting lateral bays at both rear sides a truncated, shingled turret on the southwest corner, and a third bay on the northeast corner of the facade.

Exterior details include double-hung, single light windows, with the following decorative exceptions: semi-circular or "fanlight" windows in the shingled bays; multi-paned windows in the turret, and triple-paned, double hung windows on the corner under the turret which would have allowed circulation onto the original wrap-around porch. Entry doors, including a side door in one of the projecting lateral bays, feature applied carving and oval bevelled glass lights. The main entrance is defined by a rectangular transom and sidelights surrounding the oval-glassed door.

The interior central hall plan has been maintained in the interior. Modifications have included the addition of a bathroom and sun-porch at the rear, the complete remodeling of the kitchen addition, and the conversion of an upstairs back bedroom into a master bath. (See Photo # 2 for details of additions to the rear.) Many of the original interior features of the house remain intact and unaltered. The open-well, two-flight staircase that rises through the central hall features open-string stairs with ornamental brackets, turned balusters, and simple handrails and newels -- the latter with applied carving details. An oval window on the landing of the stairs formerly held a stained-glass window. This decorative window is in the hands of the home's new owner and is to be repaired and replaced into its proper setting. (See Photo #3) Two bedrooms with original moldings and mantelpieces open off the left side of the central hall. Both rooms originally had access to the wrap-around front porch: the front room through the unusual tall windows, the rear through a bevelled-glass door.

Particularly outstanding interior features are found in the double parlors to the right of the hall. Both the front parlor (See Photo #4) and the back parlor (See Photo #5) feature fine mill-work in the moldings, the columned archway dividing the rooms, and unusual mantelpieces around the original coal-burning fireplaces. Tilework on the face of the fireplaces appears to be original, but tilework on the hearths may be modern material. Lighting fixtures in both parlors, ornate, cast-brass chandeliers with tinted metallic trim paint, appear to have been converted from gas, and are alleged to be original to the house by local historians.

A garage has been built adjacent to the rear. It is the only out-building.

A drawing of the house plan will be found on the continuation sheet.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Jones home is particularly significant because it represents a major architectural resource from its era for the town of Terry. The central mass of the house, with its hipped and multi-gabled roof, has been maintained such as it was built almost 30 years ago. Its interior wood work, unpainted and unaltered, offer Terry residents a unique glimpse of fine interior millwork and house furnishings manufactured at the turn of the century. The quality of its design and finish are unusual for a small Mississippi town, being more representative of urban tastes throughout the country at the time.

More important for Terry residents is the fact that the house was built by members of one of the town's "pioneer" families, and that most of the other "big houses" built by early town fathers have been lost to fire and other disasters. (Lynn Redding History of Terry, Mississippi, Mississippi Department of Archives and History, Jackson.)

The house apparently passed out of the Jones family's hands in 1926, when it was bought by a Laura M. Fratini (Deed Book 181, p. 410). It later passed into the hands of the descendants of the town founder, Bill Terry, where it remained until 1970, when it was sold by George B. Terry to Gordon Allison (Deed Book 1876, p. 622). The new owners are the sixth set the house has had (Deed Book 2974, p. 571).
