DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) Physical Appearance

The house, dating from the second decade of the nineteenth century, is typical of upcountry South Carolina farm houses of that period, with the exception that it is constructed of brick. Basically, the architecture of the house is late-Georgian of a type that traveled through Virginia to the Carolinas during the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries. A development of the early dogtrot plan, the house has a central hall with a large room opening off either side.

The building is two-storied and the second floor has the same arrangement as the first. There is no basement. All first floor windows are double sash 9/9 and all second floor windows are double sash 6/9; a jack arch caps every window. At either end of the house is a double shouldered and corbeled chimney. One brick of the east chimney is inscribed with the date 1821. Just under the eaves in the front and rear of the building run corbeled stringcourses which join a concrete belt course on the gable ends. The brickwork is Flemish bond.

 $$ Attached to the rear of the house is a two-story wooden leanto comprising – four rooms. This was a much later addition. The front porch is original, z although the roofline has been altered.

The original paint still remains in the interior of the house and appears to be in unusually good condition, although age has mellowed the colors. In the entrance hall, a staircase leads to the second floor, while just inside the room to the left of the entrance, a second, less impressive, staircase parallels the first to the second story. There is a fireplace in each room. Interior woodwork--mantels, wainscoting, cornices, and moulding--is typical of the period. An additional feature of the house is the presence of the original wooden curtain holders.

Altogether, the house presents an interesting study of upcountry South Carolina building construction during the first years of the nineteenth century.

This Georgian colonial farm house is typical of upcountry design, although it is one of the few of its period to be constructed of brick in this region. Near the house stands a barn which is built of hand-hewn logs and probably is contemporary with the house. In addition, it is important that the original interior paints (blues and red) remain in an unusually good state of preservation.

Built by the Means family, who furnished soldiers for both the Revolution and the War of 1812 and who also furnished a governor of the state, the house reflects the typical upcountry family which began the development of the Carolina backcountry and continued a prominent role in the development of the state.

The Means House and 20 acres has been obtained by the Union County Historical Foundation which plans to restore the house to its original state and open it to the public.
