The Greene County Courthouse, erected in 1869, was "perhaps the last Greek Revival public building (constructed) in Alabama," according to Architect Clay Lancaster.

This structure is important primarily because it demonstrates the waning vitality of Greek Revival architecture in Alabama after 1865. In this last structure the Greek Revival has lost its strength: pilasters and cornices remain as the only distinguishing features of the style, and even the pilasters are reduced to little more than ineffectual frames around the upper windows; the cornice has become a thin horizontal projection at odds with the compactness of the building.

The present brick and stucco structure was built on the same foundation, following almost the same plan, as the earlier frame building which was burned shortly after the Civil War. There was little doubt that the fire was a deliberate act of arson perpetrated to destroy indictments brought against local citizens by the Reconstruction Government.

The frame building had been constructed in 1838 on land conveyed to the county by Asa White, a prosperous settler, after the county seat was moved from Erie to Eutaw. A centmal square was laid out for the court-house, and lots around the square were sold to finance the building, a well-proportioned, two-story frame edifice.
