Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

Prominently situated on the campus of Wood Junior College is Wood Hall, a large, two-story on raised basement brick structure built in 1914. Originally constructed as a boys' dormitory for Bennett Academy, precursor to the present institution, the building bears some stylistic affinity with the Italianate, although the severity of composition and limitation of ornamentation indicate a vernacular interpretation employing a reduced vocabulary of forms and motifs.

Rectangular in plan, three-bays-by-seven, Wood Hall originally had a double-hipped roof which was subsequently modified and extended on the eastern end into a gabled portico rising two stories above the full basement level. Ornamental features of the building include brick segmental arches over most doors and windows; a transom-lighted main entrance (east elevation) and pedimented secondary entrance on the north; brick belt courses occurring at the first and second floor sill levels; a modillioned wooden cornice at the eaves; and a pair of chimneys with corbeled caps that pierce the roof. The tall, narrow, double-hung windows with their nine-over-nine glazing configuration are one of the more salient elements indicative of Wood Hall's Italianate origins. As built, shed dormers graced both the east and west elevations; these were supplanted by lunette-shaped ventilators positioned on the north and south facing roof planes. Porticoes over the east and north entrances, each consisting of four square columns, essentially flat roofs, and straight stair runs from the middle bay to ground level, have also been removed. In the 1920's an uncovered porch was constructed wrapping around to connect these two porticoes. Subsequently (ca. 1936) the structure was partially modified on the eastern end by the addition of the aforementioned gabled portico; thus the original roof planes and dormer were altered. Four large, square wooden columns define this new portico rising from a built-up brick porch such that the main (first) floor is left open and the second floor (originally a sleeping porch) is enclosed by ranges of multiple-light casement windows. The pedimented gable above the porches features handsome dentil molding and a circular light with delicate tracery. A divided brick and concrete stair with wrought iron railings rise from ground level to front the portico.

The plan of Wood Hall is similar through all three floors, consisting of a central hall which bisects the space east to west. Various instructional, mechanical, and storage rooms are arrayed on either side of this double-loaded corridor. The staircase is located at the western (rear) end of the hall; the stairs and balusters are of ornamental ironwork with a wooden handrail. As the building has been continuously occupied by the institution since construction, its structural integrity has been maintained.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Wood Junior College stands today in lasting tribute to a group of early Webster County families who founded and supported an educational facility for their children at a time and in a place where it would have otherwise been unattainable. The school, now located near Mathiston, is a direct descendant of an elementary school begun by a group of Methodist families at Colfax Chapel, circa 1880. Wood Hall, as the oldest extant building associated with the present campus, has assumed important historical and symbolic significance in its intimate connection with educational progress in rural northeast Mississippi.

Though the Mississippi Constitution of 1868 made provisions for a statewide system of free public education, in reality most localities went without or gained such facilities only through private initiative. Indeed, it was not until 1901 that public high schools were established in all towns of any import, and during this time it must be remembered that less than ten percent of the state's children lived in towns. Thus the majority of children in Mississippi had only limited access to education of any kind (James W. Loewen and Charles Sallis, editors, Mississippi: Conflict and Change [New York, NY: Pantheon Books, 1974], pp. 150, 210).

The first school at Colfax Chapel, intended to serve that community along with Maben and Mathiston, apparently faltered after only a few years due to its isolated location and few students. In 1885 a second attempt at Clarkson was made with the formation of Woodland Seminary, an elementary level institution. Opening with sixteen students under the instruction of Sam Fagg, first paid teacher, this school was largely financed by special appeals made in Northern churches through the Freedman's Aid Society. When this source of support faded in the 1890's, the Women's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church became interested in the school, taking complete control in 1897. Around 1900 the institution was renamed Bennett Academy and a few years after that relocated to its present campus at Mathiston, primarily to be nearer to the railroad. At this time local citizens donated forty-three acres and $5,000 to the school, this broad-based support apparently resulting from its being the only educational institution of any consequence (public or private) in the vicinity.

Wood Home for Boys (Wood Hall), originally built as a boys' dormitory in 1914, was financed through the generosity of Dr. and Mrs. I. C. Wood of Logan, Iowa. Functioning variously through the years as a dining hall, student union, and classroom building, Wood Hall has become the symbolic center and focus for student life at the school. In the 1920's the school began its transformation into a junior college with the elimination of lower level coursework, and in

8 - SIGNIFICANCE

1934 was renamed Wood Junior College after its most generous benefactors (Webster Progress, Eupora, Mississippi, March 16, 1933, and History of the Development of Wood Junior College, an unpublished manuscript by Dr. Jasper Weber, found in WPA Source Material, Webster County).

Many alumni have achieved positions of prominence in the public and private sector on both state and national levels, including: two Mississippi Supreme Court justices; an assistant to the Director, FBI; vice-chancellor at a state university, and various state officials and legislators.
