The Citizens State Bank is a one-story brick building with classical details. It is two bays wide with a plate glass window with three transoms dominating the right bay. An inset entry with a sandstone pediment is in the other bay. Banded brick pilasters support the pediment, superimposed on a pair of brick pilasters rising behind it. A similar pilaster is at the corner. Several brick bands interrupt the pilaster's vertical thrust and the building terminates with a brick cornice with a stone cap. The building stands on a raised foundation with two casement basement windows.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Citizens State Bank building has local architectural significance as this small town's bank building. Its classical details, pretentious entry, and single window distinguish it from the less ornate commercial blocks which constitute the streetscape. As such it is a Gooding landmark.

Architect R. E. Vincent of Spokane considered relocating in Gooding in 1916. He designed several structures for the city of which this is the best example.

Item 7.

The exterior of the Gooding State Bank has survived two major functional conversions--first to a public library and then to a business office--with an absolutely unaltered exterior. A sketch of the proposed building published in the Gooding Leader in April of 1916 shows not only the same massing and masonry detail but the same disposition of elements in the windows, with a single large square of plate glass, surmounted by three smaller rectangular lights. The interior of the buildings has been completely altered. The 25x 48 foot mahogany-finished banking room--the full width of the building, and two-thirds of its length--which was described at the time the bank was built, has been repaneled, re-partitioned and carpeted, and retains none of its original architectural significance.

This structure is continuous with a streetscape dating largely from the 'teens and 'twenties and containing numerous examples of brick construction in both one and two stories. Its significance relative to these other examples is addressed in item 8 below.

Item 8.

Gooding Main Street displays a high proportion of early brick buildings; however much has been stuccoed, and most of the un-stuccoed examples have been altered to one degree or another. Of the several early and still exposed examples on Main north of Fifth, one small shop has an altered storefront, another is generally unaltered but very unassuming architecturally. Several other brick buildings are in better condition and have real merit: a fine two-story theatre building on the southeast corner of Third and Main, which combines elaborate brickwork with a galvanized iron cornice; an early hotel on the west side of Main near Second, which displays a belt course in contrasting brick between flat arched windows; an early store across from the bank which displays multiple corbels of various patterns of stepped and outset brick.

The Citizen's State Bank building is exemplary among these sibling structures because of its pristine condition; it alone shows neither alteration or deterioration. It is also noteworthy for its use of the classical vocabulary, which is unique on the street, and its incorporation of stone, which probably stems from the same impulse to project a stable, prosperous image. This stylistically self-conscious mode appears to be the particular contribution to Gooding of architect R. E. Vincent to the existing tradition of brick building in that town. The Spokane architect's season in Gooding resulted in only one other reported building, the Fashbaugh residence. Unfortunately nothing more is known of that commission than that it was considered to be a bungalow.

The Citizen's State Bank has historical importance, too, as one of the first two banks in an irrigation tract townsite. According to Glen Barrett's history of Idaho banking, the pioneer bank of Gooding, Lincoln State Bank, was opened the same year the townsite was, in 1907. Citizen's Bank, opened in 1908, apparently took over its predecessor in 1913.¹ This was evidently an unusually productive period for the institution. Within three years its directors were prepared to hire an architect to design a handsome little banking building on one of the principal intersections of the town. During the previous two years, the newspaper announcement of the building project reported, volume of business at the bank had doubled.² The end of the second decade of the century was about the limit of this bank's prosperity, however. "G. W. Wedgewood and his cashier, J. H. Leyson, had the Citizen's State Bank in good shape by the end of World War I," Barrett writes. "But they were not able to keep it open after agricultural prices fell in the Twenties. Their Citizen's State Bank closed in April 1925."³ The bank was survived by one which had formed a year later, the First National (originally the Gooding State) Bank.

It has not been possible to determine whether the building continued to be used for its original purpose after 1925. It functioned as the town library from the mid-20s to the late '70s, and is now a title company office.
