Congo Square is a parcel of public land located on Rampart Street just across from the French Quarter. Although its appearance has changed over the years, the square retains its National Register eligibility as an open public area famous for its Sunday slave dances.

Congo Square has been open space since Fort St. Ferdinand was demolished c.1804. It became a square in 1812 when the City Commons area outside the old walled city was subdivided. It appears as "Place Publique" on an 1812 map and was bounded by Rampart, St. Claude, St. Ann and the Carondelet Canal's turning basin. Maps from 1834 and 1841 show St. Peter Street as the southwestern boundary with the turning basin just beyond.

After about 1816 the square became known as Place du Cirque, or Circus Place, because of the circuses that set up there. This name appears both on maps and in official documents. Although never officially designated as such, it was popularly known as Congo Square because of the slave dances that occurred there on Sunday afternoons.

There is some contradiction concerning the square's earliest appearance. Historian Jerah Johnson refers to it as "a starkly bare open field in the middle of an otherwise lushly overgrown city," but on another occasion describes it as "an open, grass-covered field with only a few trees." Paxton's 1822 New Orleans Register and Directory notes that the "Circus public square is planted with trees." The scholarly record indicates that trees were planted in 1820, 1845, 1884-85 and 1893. The present large oak trees date from the 1893 period and were planted when the square was renamed Beauregard Square.

The next stage in Congo Square's development was the construction of the Municipal Auditorium abutting the square in 1929-30. This involved removing St. Claude Street, and thus the square looks as if it is the front yard to the auditorium (see map).

The most recent changes to Congo Square came in the 1970s with the development of Louis Armstrong Park by the city. Essentially adjacent Congo Square was joined to the park. This was accomplished by removing St. Ann Street and extending the park's steel fence (in imitation of old New Orleans wrought iron) around Congo Square. Because of its location in relationship to the park, Congo Square is visually still a distinct entity (see map).

As part of the Armstrong Park work, Congo Square received a fountain specifically designed to represent the slave dances for which the square is most famous (the source of its Register significance). Much of the square was paved with brick in a design of overlapping circles to represent the manner in which the slaves danced (see Part 8). At the center of the paving are subterranean fountain jets arranged in a circular fashion.

Assessment of Integrity

Although Congo Square's appearance has changed since the period of the slave dances, the important point is that it remains a separate and distinct, completely open public commons. It should also be noted that trees in one form or another have been there since at least 1820.
Congo Square is locally significant in the area of ethnic heritage because it was the focus of an important aspect of New Orleans' African-American history. Beginning in the early nineteenth century and continuing up to roughly the Civil War, the square was the site of slave dances on Sundays. In the early days, the dances and music were African, but by the 1830s and '40s American culture had made its impact.

It should be noted that African-Americans were a very important group in the history and development of antebellum New Orleans. While there are a great many historic properties associated with them, either as slaves or free people of color, Congo Square is believed to be the only site which is specifically and compellingly associated with the retention of their African heritage. It was also a major focal point of that heritage, being a place where at times hundreds congregated. According to historian Gary A. Donaldson, "Congo Square was the focal point of a subculture of New Orleans black slaves who carried on a lifestyle as close as possible to what they had remembered from their earlier lives in Africa (or what they had been told Africa was like)." He concludes: "The importance of Congo Square cannot be underestimated as an attempt by African slaves to hold on to what they could of their heritage."

The most well-known account of the legendary dances at Congo Square was left us by Benjamin Latrobe, who happened to stumble upon the square one Sunday afternoon in 1819. He was walking up St. Peter Street and heard "a most extraordinary noise," which he thought must have come from "some horse mill, the horses trampling on a wooden floor." He found, however, that it came from a "crowd of 5 or 600 persons assembled in an open space or public square." Blacks "were formed into circular groups in the midst of which was a ring . . . ten feet in diameter." He observed in one ring two women dancing: "They held each a coarse handkerchief, extended by the corners, in their hands . . . . " "The music," Latrobe continued, "consisted of two drums and a stringed instrument." He described an old man who played a large cylindrical drum, beating it "with incredible quickness with the edge of his hand and fingers." Together with a second smaller drum, "they made an incredible noise." Latrobe described the stringed instrument as a "most curious instrument . . . which no doubt was imported from Africa." The carving on top of the finger board was "the rude figure of a man in a sitting posture." "The body," he added, "was a calabash. It was played upon by a very little old man, apparently eighty or ninety years old."

Latrobe described another instrument that "consisted of a block cut into something of the form of a cricket bat, with a long and deep mortise down the center . . . ." He also observed an instrument in the shape of "a calabash with a round hole in it, the hole studded with brass nails . . . ." It was beaten by a woman with two short sticks. "A man sung an uncouth song to the dancing which I suppose was in some African language, for it was not French," wrote Latrobe. He concluded that "the allowed amusements of Sunday, have, it seems, perpetuated here, those of Africa among its inhabitants." The description was accompanied by sketches of some of the instruments.

Latrobe's account is of the square in the heyday of its African heritage. Scholars have noted the strong similarities between the instruments used and native African instruments, and the circles in the dances are believed to represent different tribes. By the 1830s American influence had begun to make itself felt, and as time went on, the activities became less and less specifically African. However, as late as 1845, a reporter witnessed in the square what he called "regular Ethiopian breakdowns." He noted that the happy crowd was equipped with "rude instruments of their own contrivance, the like of which we have never seen before." The last known period account (A. Oakey Hall, The Manhattener in New Orleans, 1851) spoke of "clattering bones, and barrel-headed drumming."

Explanation of Period of Significance

Scholars point to the Sunday dances at Congo Square as beginning in the early nineteenth century, but it is impossible to establish a specific date. It appears that the dancing may have antedated the square's creation in 1812, although perhaps in a larger, less defined area. However, it seemed logical and appropriate to use the 1812 date as the beginning of the period of significance.

The exact ending date for the dances also cannot be determined. As noted above, the last known period account is from 1851. In that year the site became the Place d'Armes where the militia drilled on Sundays. However, the leading Congo Square historian, Jerah Johnson, asserts that the dancing continued up until the eve of the Civil War. Based upon this, a c.1860 date has been chosen for the ending of the period of significance.

Boundary Description:  See enclosed sketch map.

Boundary Justification:

The boundaries shown on the enclosed sketch map were chosen to correspond as accurately as possible to those from the period of significance. Historic maps and the present-day street plan enable one to delineate St. Ann and St. Peter streets (northeastern and southwestern boundaries respectively). The square's rear boundary cuts as close as possible to the front steps of the Municipal Auditorium.
