The Union capture of Fort Henry gave them access to the Tennessee River, and after the fall of Fort Donelson eight days later the river was open into the heart of the Confederate states. This cut the Confederate states off from the old northwest and pushed their forces back further into the south. Capture of Fort Henry by the Union forces also led indirectly to the sinking, or capture by Federal forces, of all but one of the Confederate steamboats operating in the area. The value of the ironclad as a river weapon was proven by the fact that Fort Henry surrendered to a naval force and not an army force. The action also cost the Confederates seventeen pieces of artillery, five dead, eleven wounded, five missing, and seventyeight prisoners.

Fort Henry was named for Gustavus A. Henry who represented the State of Tennessee in the Confederate senate at Richmond from 1861 to 1865, but it was Major General Bushrod Johnson who selected the site for the fort. Work on the construction of Fort Henry began on June 14, 1861. The Confederacy was trying to avoid violating the proclaimed neutrality of Kentucky and thus the fort was placed in Tennessee when actually the west bank of the river, or Kentucky, would have been a much better choice. As it was the fort was constructed on the east bank of the river at a place so low that when the river rose water would overflow into the lower parts of the works.

From the beginning of January 1862, the fort was subject to occasional shellings by Union gunboats, but on February 6, Flag Officer Andrew H. Foote and his gunboats began their attack in ernest. After a fairly hot engagement of some 75 minutes, the fort surrendered.

A Union camp was then established outside the fort following the surrender and the Union forces then went on to capture Fort Donelson.
