Despite a busy federal highway (U. S. 69) on the west and a heavily traveled railroad (the M. K. & T.) on the east, the site of Middle Boggy Battle and Confederate Cemetery is strangely idyllic today. The road is shielded by a low ridge; the steel rails of the "Katy" are somewhat depressed in the rolling, grass-covered earth. One can stand on the pleasantly tree-shaded mound containing the cemetery, look across its jumble of stones to the heavily wooded Middle Boggy, and find it difficult to recreate the briefly bloody encounter that gives the site its position

Traces of the old Texas Road (retired when the "Katy" arrived in 1872) can still be seen on the site. The spring that once made the area an inviting camping spot along the trail can also be found. A road leads down to the site from the official historical marker beside U. S. 69. The Oklahoma Historical Society has supervision of the property (through lease and easement agreements) and has erected suitable informational signs. No attempt has been made, nor is one contemplated, to preserve the entire battle site itself, even if its precise bounds could be determined.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Middle Boggy Battle was fought near the stream of that name-- in present Atoka County--on February 18, 1864. The fierce skirmish, to quote Oklahoma's official Historic Sites Survey and Preservation Plan, "is noteworthy for marking the farthest drive towards Texas of the Union forces in the Civil War. Although the engagement was indecisive, Union troops did not attempt to move farther south; thus the site is the highwater mark of northern penetration of Indian Territory."

Confederate forces included Lt. Col. John Jumper's Seminole Battalion, Capt. Adam Nail's Co. A of the First Choctaw and Chickasaw Cavalry, and a detachment of the 20th Texas Regiment. Union forces, under the command of Col. William A. Phillips, commanding officer at Fort Gibson, included three companies of the Fourteenth Kansas Cavalry under Maj. Charles Willette and a section of howitzers under Capt. Solomon Kaufman. Surprised and poorly armed, the Southerners made a firm stand while losing 47 men killed. (No injuries were reported among the Union cavalrymen.) They were saved from a more serious defeat when the report of reinforcements moving up from Boggy Depot to the southwest caused Col. Phillips to break contact and return to Fort Gibson.

This was the last invasion of Confederate-held Indian Territory, as well as the Union's deepest penetration of the area. Confederate forces would probe north of the Arkansas River later in 1864, after which both sides resorted only to guerrilla tactics for the duration of the war.

Though the site's chief claim to historic note came on a single bloody day, its position of the road to Boggy Depot made it well known before and after the war. Crossing this area were the famed Texas Road (primary transportation and communications link between Kansas, Indian Territory and Texas) and the route of the Butterfield stages between St. Louis and San Francisco. Early in the winter of 1862, during the movement of Confederate Indian troops north for service in Missouri and Arkansas, Choctaw and Chickasaw regiments camped here along the Middle Boggy. From this time on the area was known as a Confederate encampment, occupied periodically by various units of Indian forces and Texas cavalry. Late in the war it served as an outpost guarding Boggy Depot, by then the main Confederate commissary in Indian Territory.

No. 8. Significance

Following the Middle Boggy Battle many Southern soldiers were buried here (it is the state's most extensively marked Confederate cemetery) because the ground already held the graves of earlier travelers along these busy pioneer routes. Although many of the burials are now unmarked, crude sandstone markers dating from as early as 1862 can be distinguished.
