The Brooklyn School District #42 schoolhouse is located in Brooklyn Township, Lincoln County. It is located in a rural area of Lincoln County. The simple schoolhouse was constructed in 1895 for the betterment of the rural community.

The school rests on a concrete block foundation which was added in 1958. The addition of the basement did not change the elevation of the school. The entire building is clad with wood clapboards. The roof is covered with asphalt shingles. The façade (south elevation) is unornamented. Two concrete steps lead to the central entry door.

The west and east elevations are identical. They each have five, two-over-two double hung windows. Each window has a wood sill and lintel. The north elevation (rear) has no openings.

The interior has a cloak room at the southeast corner and a restroom in the southwest corner. Also located in the southwest corner is a set of stairs leading to the basement. The chalkboard and platform/stage is located on the north wall.

The Brooklyn District School #42 in the Brooklyn Township, Lincoln County, South Dakota is eligible for the National Register of Historic Places under criteria A and C. The building is locally significant under Criterion A in the context of education for its role in the educational development of schools in rural South Dakota during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and under criterion C as an excellent example of early rural schoolhouse construction commonly built in South Dakota during the 1890s.

Local residents organized Brooklyn Township in 1870. Shortly thereafter, the community formed a school district and established the township's first school. State legislation passed in 1880 provided that a township could establish as many schools as needed, as long as they were at least two miles apart. By 1895, Brooklyn School #42 was formed and constructed.

Built in 1895, the school's simple one-room, gable-end design was typical of late nineteenth century schoolhouse design in South Dakota. Often comprised of donated materials and erected with voluntary labor, it was common for communities to construct schoolhouses with a familiar form and known practices. The design of these structures relied heavily upon the established architectural styles familiar to its builders, primarily settlers who had emigrated from New England and the Midwest. The rural schoolhouse was also viewed as a cultural symbol of the community, giving it a strong connection to the church. Because of this connection, characteristics of the typical rural schoolhouse reflected familiar church architecture. Described as aesthetic, they were simple one-room structures built on temporary foundations with balloon framing, uninsulated weatherboard siding, wainscoting on the interior, and heated by a central stove. According to A Context for Education Development in South Dakota, "a schoolhouse that was well-appointed and carefully constructed, adapting architectural styles familiar to settlers from the East, symbolized the ideal of the community school. Simplicity in design and use of modest materials in construction of the school, however, always reflected the material limitations inherent in Plains settlement." The Brooklyn School District #42's design and construction reflects these characteristics.

The Brooklyn School District #42 also played an essential role in the education of children through the mid-twentieth century. Consistent with contemporary trends, it had a mandatory attendance policy. The State of South Dakota passed a compulsory attendance law in 1915, requiring all children to attend school through the completion of sixth grade, and joined in nationwide efforts to promote civic pride and responsibility among immigrant families during the same period. By 1910, immigrants and their children (generally of Northern European origin) represented more than half of South Dakota's population. To handle this population influx and help immigrant families assimilate into American culture and society, the State legislature enacted a requirement in 1918 that all schools devote one hour a week to patriotism. Many school districts also supported individual chapters of the Young Citizens League or YCL, a statewide organization for students that promoted good citizenship, patriotism, and common courtesy.

The Brooklyn School District #42 was closed in 1970 because of a declining population and local consolidation efforts. Over 65 teachers taught there during its seventy-five years of operation. The school continues to be used as the Brooklyn Township Hall. The School is eligible under Criterion A for its role in education in Brooklyn Township and Criterion C for its rural schoolhouse design.
