DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (If known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Mordington, built at the end of the eighteenth century, is one of Kent County's outstanding examples of Georgian architecture. Its double-pile plan, unusual for Delaware at this time, is just one of its distinctions. Oriented south, Mordington overlooks McCauley's Pond, at the headwaters of Murderkill River, the two-and-a-half-story brick house block is extended by a lower frame and brick wing to the east. This wing, once only eighteen feet long, has now been rebuilt and extended to fifty feet. The Flemish-bond brick exterior of the main house block has been subject to few changes since its erection.

The two main doorways have been removed to the Henry Francis duPont Winterthur Museum. The front door has been replaced by one from a house in Berlin, Maryland which is not as fine as the original.

Wooden keystones in splayed brick lintels surmount each of the twelve-over-twelve windows. A three-brick-wide belt course surrounds the house, but there is no evidence of any watertable. The denticulated box cornice is found on the north and south facades; its architrave and freize details also mark the roof line on the gable ends, breaking at each chimney. The west chimney is enclosed within the brick wall and serves six corner fireplaces. The other end chimney, partially exposed beyond the brick wall, serves a fireplace in the wing.

The original wing has been recently replace  $dQ^{\vee}$

The interior of the three-bay main block is almost entirely new. During its restoration an attempt was made to regain its original detailing while at the same time providing for those conveniences necessary to a home. In the 1930's all of the wainscoting, cornicework and the main s airway were removed to Winterthur. These features have now been copied and reinstalled in the house. The fireplace of the southwest room holds the only original woodwork, which is marked by a dog-eared bolection moulding surmounted by an unornamented frieze flanked by moulded corner blocks and by a simple cornice. Another fireplace, which has been rebuilt, displays fluted flanking pilasters and a reeded center block. The wainscot, and the interior cornice work, which resemble that of the exterior, are found to be the same throughout the house.

Only one original brick outbuilding remains next to the house. This structure has always been assumed to be a smokehouse, although there is no trace of smoke-blackening on the interior. EE INSTRUCTION

Situated in Milford Hundred, Mordington represents the lifestyle of a very prosperous eighteenth-century mill owner in Delaware.

In 1785 James Douglass bought fourteen and a half acres of land and cripple (wet lands) on Brown's Branch of Murderkill Creek from William Frazier. This adjoined property at the mill pond dam, which Douglass had bought earlier. It is believed that a frame dwelling was already on the property when Douglass bought it. A family descendent, the late Clayton Douglass Buck, believed that the brick house was built by James Douglass' son Walter. The name "Mordington" is said to be taken from the Scottish title of an ancestor who was created Baron Mordington of Clyde by King Charles I.

The Douglass family built mills at the mill pond dam; by 1822 Walter Douglass had increased his holdings there to more than five hundred acres. It is noted in family documents that the mill seat was used for smelting bog iron. Walter Douglass and his brother William were also involved in several other ironworks in Sussex County particularly the Deep Creek Furnace at the head of the Nanticoke. It is probable that they used the Mordington mill seat to power a bloomery forge, as well as for grinding grain. Certain sources indicate the presence of two water wheels and three pairs of stones in the gristmill. The remains of the stones are found around the house.

Walter Douglass' widow Harriet Middleton Douglass sold her dower rights in Mordington to Charles Kimmey in 1828. The property passed through several other owners before being deeded in 1848 to Joseph O. McColley who gave his name to the mill pond. At this point the Mordington Mills included a gristmill, a sawmill and a bark-mill. Only traces of these remain today.

There is not only history but folklore involved with the house. One of these legends concerns a slave girl who haunts the house, having jumped to her death from an upper floor after being unjustly punished. Another legend concerns a man who came home drunk one night and led his horse up the stairs.
