The Old Grandin Library on East Main Street in Clinton is an unusual cast-iron-type front building for the area with pressed metal elements on the second floor.

This two story building, constructed of brick save the front, consisted basically of one room on each floor. This floor plan is unaltered on the first floor and on the second. A cement block leanto addition was added onto the rear probably sometime in the 1940's and served as a kitchen. Another wing was constructed onto the west facade, also of cement blocks, probably built at the same time as the leanto. This addition was to provide additional garage facilities for the fire department.

A 1906 postcard of the Grandin Library shows the building in its original form indicating that the building had a small rectangular hip-roofed tower at the rear where the kitchen leanto now is located. In addition, the original garage facility on the west end also had a cast-iron front. Most of this section has been eliminated, probably when the cement block unit was built.

The front facade of the building, unaltered since construction in 1898, has a cast iron first floor. The center double doorway is somewhat inset under the main facade of the building and flanked by two closely set large bay windows on each side. In addition, off to the east side is another entrance door, leading up to the second floor.

The second floor front facade is comprised of pressed metal ornamentation and four large bay windows. The windows are separated by pressed metal columns.

Above the windows is a decorative pressed metal cornice. The gable end, which faces the front of the building, is obstructed from view by a triangular marquee, original to the building, which proclaims the date of construction (1898) and partial use (Grandin-Library).

The rest of this rectangular building is constructed of brick which is painted and has a stone foundation, but no cellar. The gable roof has a very flat pitch.

The concrete block units to the back and on the west side are of modern construction. The first story brick wall in the rear was removed when the leanto kitchen wing was added.

Except for these additions the exterior of this building is unaltered.

In addition, the Grandin Library first floor served as a temporary schoolhouse from 1921 to 1923 after the regular school burned.

Architecture

The front facade of the Grandin Library which is comprised of cast iron on the first floor and pressed metal for the second floor is typical of the once numerous modest commercial and public buildings which stood on the streets of smaller American towns and cities at the end of the 19th century.

Doing these buildings all or in part out of cast iron and pressed metal reduced the costs incurred with stone facades while retaining a high degree of ornamentation. The strength of the cast iron facade also made possible either increased size or increased space in a public building. The Grandin Library, which was built on limited funds, probably took all these factors plus that of durability into consideration when it was decided to add a cast iron/pressed metal front facade.

Although at one time these types of buildings were apparently fairly common throughout the United States they have been numerously destroyed throughout the years making the existence of such a building in Clinton of local significance architecturally.

A 1913 catalog of George L. Mesker & Co. of Indiana claimed that they had 51 pressed metal fronts in New Jersey alone. (And this company was a considerable distance from the state)

Other scattered reports of late 19th-early 20th century businesses which produced similar facades indicate that there may have been several hundred such buildings in New Jersey. And although a census has never been completed concerning castiron type buildings which presently exist within the state the presence of the Grandin Library is unique to Clinton, and, possibly, the county.
