This two story, painted brick courthouse has a compact exterior with four gabled pavilions. The clock tower projects from the structure and a large round arch focuses attention on the front facade entry. The top of the clock tower, damaged in a cyclone, has been replaced by a much smaller one in no way resembling the original. The windows on the first floor are segmentally arched, those on the second floor are round arched with ornamental keystones. Some of the chimneys remain.

The first floor has a large foyer with staircase and halls leading off from the entry in a Y shaped plan. In the courtroom the pressed metal ceiling is of an ornate design. Some of the old four blade fans still are suspended from the ceiling as are bare light bulbs that hang from a single cord. The litigation section is unusually large; the wooden bench is simple and given dignity by a plain entablature and engaged Corinthian columns behind it.
