The Justus C. Ramsey House is a one-room stone cottage constructed between 1855 and 1857 with locally quarried limestone, laid in rough ashlar courses. trimmed stone while the side and rear walls are merely rough "slag" pieces of stones roughly laid up in 18-inch thick walls. Originally, the only windows were at the front facade, along with the door, but two windows were cut in the east wall sometime after the turn of the century. The house is roofed with a simple gable with a single chimney midway along the roof peak. Wide, unornamented cornice boards give definition to the early Greek Revival appearance. Noteworthy are the heavy dressed stone lintels over the windows and door at the front facade.

The building is in need of repair and restoration, although in very good structural condition for its age. The interior, however, has been badly altered, for in the course of past repairs to the building the interior butternut woodwork and baseboards had been inadvertently destroyed.

The cottage is located near the St. Paul central business district and along one of the city's busiest traffic arterials, West Seventh Street, which is the old Fort Snelling Road. The site is presently endangered due to a contemplated widening of the street in the near future.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Built between 1855 and 1857 and a well-preserved representation of an early pioneer cottage, the stone building, known commonly as The Justus Ramsey House is an excellent example of frontier stone craftsmanship.

Justus Ramsey, brother and business/real estate partner of the Minnesota political giant, Alexander Ramsey (see nomination form for the Alexander Ramsey House) is commonly attributed to have built this house as his first residence. However, a check of the Minnesota Historical Society's Ramsey manuscripts, a collection of business and personal records for both brothers, reveal that the first reference to the building is a lease in 1857 to a well-known historical family in early Minnesota. Also a thorough check of the early St. Paul city directories and land transfer records fail to uncover any evidence of a Ramsey residency. They do, however, reveal that the building was constructed during Ramsey's ownership. This is further reinforced by a check of the city real estate tax records which show a major tax increase for 1857.

Ramsey lost the building in 1859 as a result of the financial crash which nearly bankrupted the embryonic state and the stone house then went through a lengthy series of land transfers until the turn of the century. The house has traditionally been used as income property since its earliest days and has served as residence for some of St. Paul's most colorful pioneers. The Munger brothers, a family who later became millionnaires, trading in grain issues at Duluth, M nnesota are the first recorded residents. One brother, W. A. Munger, As especially well known for he is locally attributed to have commissioned Dan Emmett, the brother of the state's first Supreme Court Justice, Lafayette Emmett, to write the famous song "Dixie." This apparently took place during Emmett's visit to St. Paul in the late 1850s and a specially requested work for Munger's band, the first private band organized in Minnesota. Should further research prove this true, the house would be the only extant site to interpret this incident.

The house, during the late nineteenth and early twentieth century was the home of a pioneer clothier, a real estate entrepender, and even functioned for a short time as a kitchen for the neighboring boarding house. In the 1930s the house was bought by its present owner, and has been used as part of an antique store ever since.

The Justus C. Ramsey House is mainly important for its association with the Ramsey family. Justus and Alexander were tightly associated in their early business dealings and no doubt that the location of the stone house had some part in the location of the first Alexander Ramsey House, the first permanent governor's house, on the lot to the rear. When the stone house first exchanged hands, both brothers owned an equal share of the property.
