The Cyrus Wheelock House is a $1 \frac{1}{2}$ story adobe "square cabin" folk/vernacular house type. The house measures about 18' x 15' (see attached plan drawing) and was originally equipped with a small "lean-to" shed roof kitchen extension to the rear. The house faces west and has a gable roof and north-end stove chimney. Applied decoration is minimal. The house has a symmetrical three-opening facade. The original adobe construction has been left exposed and remains in excellent condition.

While the house is basically unaltered, there have been many additions to the rear. Several one-story brick rooms were attached to the east lean-to and a unobtrusive frame enclosure has been tacked-on to the north side of this rear addition. Built in the 1880s, these additions reflect the original architectural style of the house and do not detract from its historic appearance.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

The Cyrus Wheelock home is historically important as an excellent example of folk/vernacular architectural design in Utah. While larger homes have received considerable attention, this small square cabin type house, although certainly the standard dwelling for many Utah settlers of modest income, has been consistently overlooked. The Wheelock adobe home represents the economical bottom-end of the vernacular architectural spectrum. This is not to suggest that the home is inferior in quality of workmanship. The house is well-made and exhibits carefully considered design features. The house, however, is small. It represents the size of dwelling which an owner of moderate means could afford. Taken in the context of the full range of vernacular building types, the Wheelock House allows the historian to document the total architectural community of a Utah town - the humble as well as the powerful.

As can be expected, this small adobe home changed hands often during its lifetime as owners repeatedly moved on to larger accommodations. Cyrus Wheelock, born in 1813 in Henderson, Nevada, was the first occupant and builder of the house. Wheelock was baptized into the LDS Church in 1839 and moved to Nauvoo, Illinois, the then main Mormon city on the Mississippi. A close friend of the Mormon prophet, Joseph Smith, Wheelock was one of the last to visit with him before his murder in the Carthage jail in 1844.¹ Wheelock went west to Utah in 1848 when the Church was expelled from Nauvoo and then served a proselitizing misssion in England.² After some moving around, Cyrus arrived in Mt. Pleasant in 1863. Hilda M. Longsdorf in her Mt. Pleasant, states that "In December (1863), Cyrus H. Wheelock, a pioneer from Nauvoo who was well acquainted with the Prophet Joseph (Smith) and his brother Hyrum, moved from Springville to Mt. Pleasant and made his home. He was a splendid speaker and was often at public meetings to address the people."³ In Utah, Cyrus Wheelock was employed primarily as a sawyer.⁴ Wheelock owned this property through the 1860s and sold it to John H. Olsen in 1874. Mary Ann Young bought the home in 1882. The house was sold and resold several times in the later 19th century and in this century it is primarily associated with the Madsen family.

As a vernacular building type, the "square cabin" house became a traditional English form during the 16th century.⁵ The house type was a mainstay in most of the American colonies and migrated westward through the midwestern states⁶ and to Mormon Utah.⁷
