DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Jim Lane's cabin is the oldest man-made structure still standing in Beaver City and, indeed, in all of No Man's Land. The following description of it is by a New York Sun reporter who visited the area and wrote a series of stories for eastern readers on the then wild frontier. This was in 1888 and 1889.

The house that he built is still standing in excellent condition. It is a monument to the skill of the frontiersman in adapting himself to his surroundings. It was built of prairie sod 14x36 feet large, with an L 18x14 at one end. Its rafters are made of poles cut from the woods that then stood along the streams; brush served in place of the ordinary sheeting over the rafters, and layers of prairie sod took the place of shingles on the brush sheeting. The walls within were plastered with a mixture of sand and gypsum dug from the hills along the stream. The prairie sod served admirably for a time as the floor, though a wooden one has since been added. Except for a few panes of glass and door and window frame and two doors Jim, as he was familiarly called depended not at all on the products of civilized communities for his shelter.

Some years later two rooms of this original soddy were incorporated into a larger house, given a new, unifying roof. The exterior walls were stuccoed. Because this stucco has weathered to a slightly darker color where it covered the sod, one can still clearly make out the conformation of the north wall of the original house. After the store was discontinued the building was used for a residence, and continues as a residence today. Over the years, however, the family now living in it has converted some of the interior and much of the yard into an informal, largely unorganized pioneer museum. The house itself, with its original sod section, is maintained in satisfactory condition.

No. 7 Description

Lane Cabin

Despite appearances, the integrity of the original sod house is virtually complete. Lee Hulse acquired the property in 1935, the ninth owner after it passed from the Lane family to Carter Tracy in 1899. Hulse apparently recognized the historical value of the old house and, while adding to it, made an effort to keep the original intact. He added two frame rooms to the east, then extended the new roof back to the west so as to completely cover the old (original) section. He then stuccoed with cement, inside and out. While this has served to pretty well hide (disguise?) the original sod, it has also served to preserve it.

Attention is called again to the enclosed picture that delineates -faintly, but irrefutably -- the outline of the sod. The stucco covering this original wall is definitely darker than that covering the much later addition, of frame construction. Unfortunately, this gable is on the north, so the lighting is not ideal. But the outline is unmistakeable.

Beneath the stucco, as best as can be determined, the outside dimensions of the original sod house are 20 feet wide (east-west) and 30 feet long (north-south). Inside dimensions of the two rooms are  $14-1/2 \times 19$  feet. Height of the side walls is 7 feet. Comb of the gable roof is 14 feet above the ground.

The two original sod house rooms are now used to house units of the Beaver Museum, a private venture of the present owner, Louise E. Sharp, who acquired the property in 1957.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

So long as buffaloes roamed the arid section of the Southern Plains now known as the Oklahoma Panhandle, along with the various Indian tribes that lived off them, the region remained virtually uninhabited. Then around 1875, with the disappearance of the buffaloes and confinement of the Indians to reservations, cattlemen began to move in. And around 1885, as free land became increasingly scarce and word of the grass-rich region spread, settlers followed to "squat" on the more desirable parcels of land. With cattlemen and settlers thus contending for the land, and no legal government to maintain law and order, the situation was obviously ripe for trouble. And trouble came. In addition, No Man's Land -- and it was that, literally -- became a haven for criminals on the lam from surrounding states and territories that had no authority over this 5,738-square-mile rectangle (168 miles east-west, 34 miles north-south).

The problem had grown so serious by 1886 that various vigilante committees met to try to give the region a semblance of order and legitimacy. They organized a Respective Claim Board, divided the strip into three districts. Representatives of these districts met in Beaver City late that year, organized themselves into a deliberative body. By 1887 they had organized a territorial form of government and sent delegations to Washington to try to get Congressional approval for formation of the Territory of Cimarron. These efforts were continued, without success, until Oklahoma Territory became a fact in 1890.

Meanwhile, Beaver City itself had developed into a thriving little frontier settlement. It began in March 1880 when James Lane, a one-time cowboy, brought his family down from Dodge City and established a home and trading post where the Jones and Plummer Cattle Trail and the Tascosa Trail crossed the Beaver River. (The Beaver, which drains much of the Panhandle, is known as the North Fork of the Canadian in the rest of Oklahoma.)

To Lane's house/store ranchers of the area came for their beans, coffee, dried salt bacon, tobacco, whiskey, and cartridges. For a time he enjoyed a virtual monopoly and his business flourished. When agents for the Beaver City Town Company arrived in 1882 -- to lay out and "boom" a settlement in No Man's Land -- an oral agreement was made with

No. 8. Significance

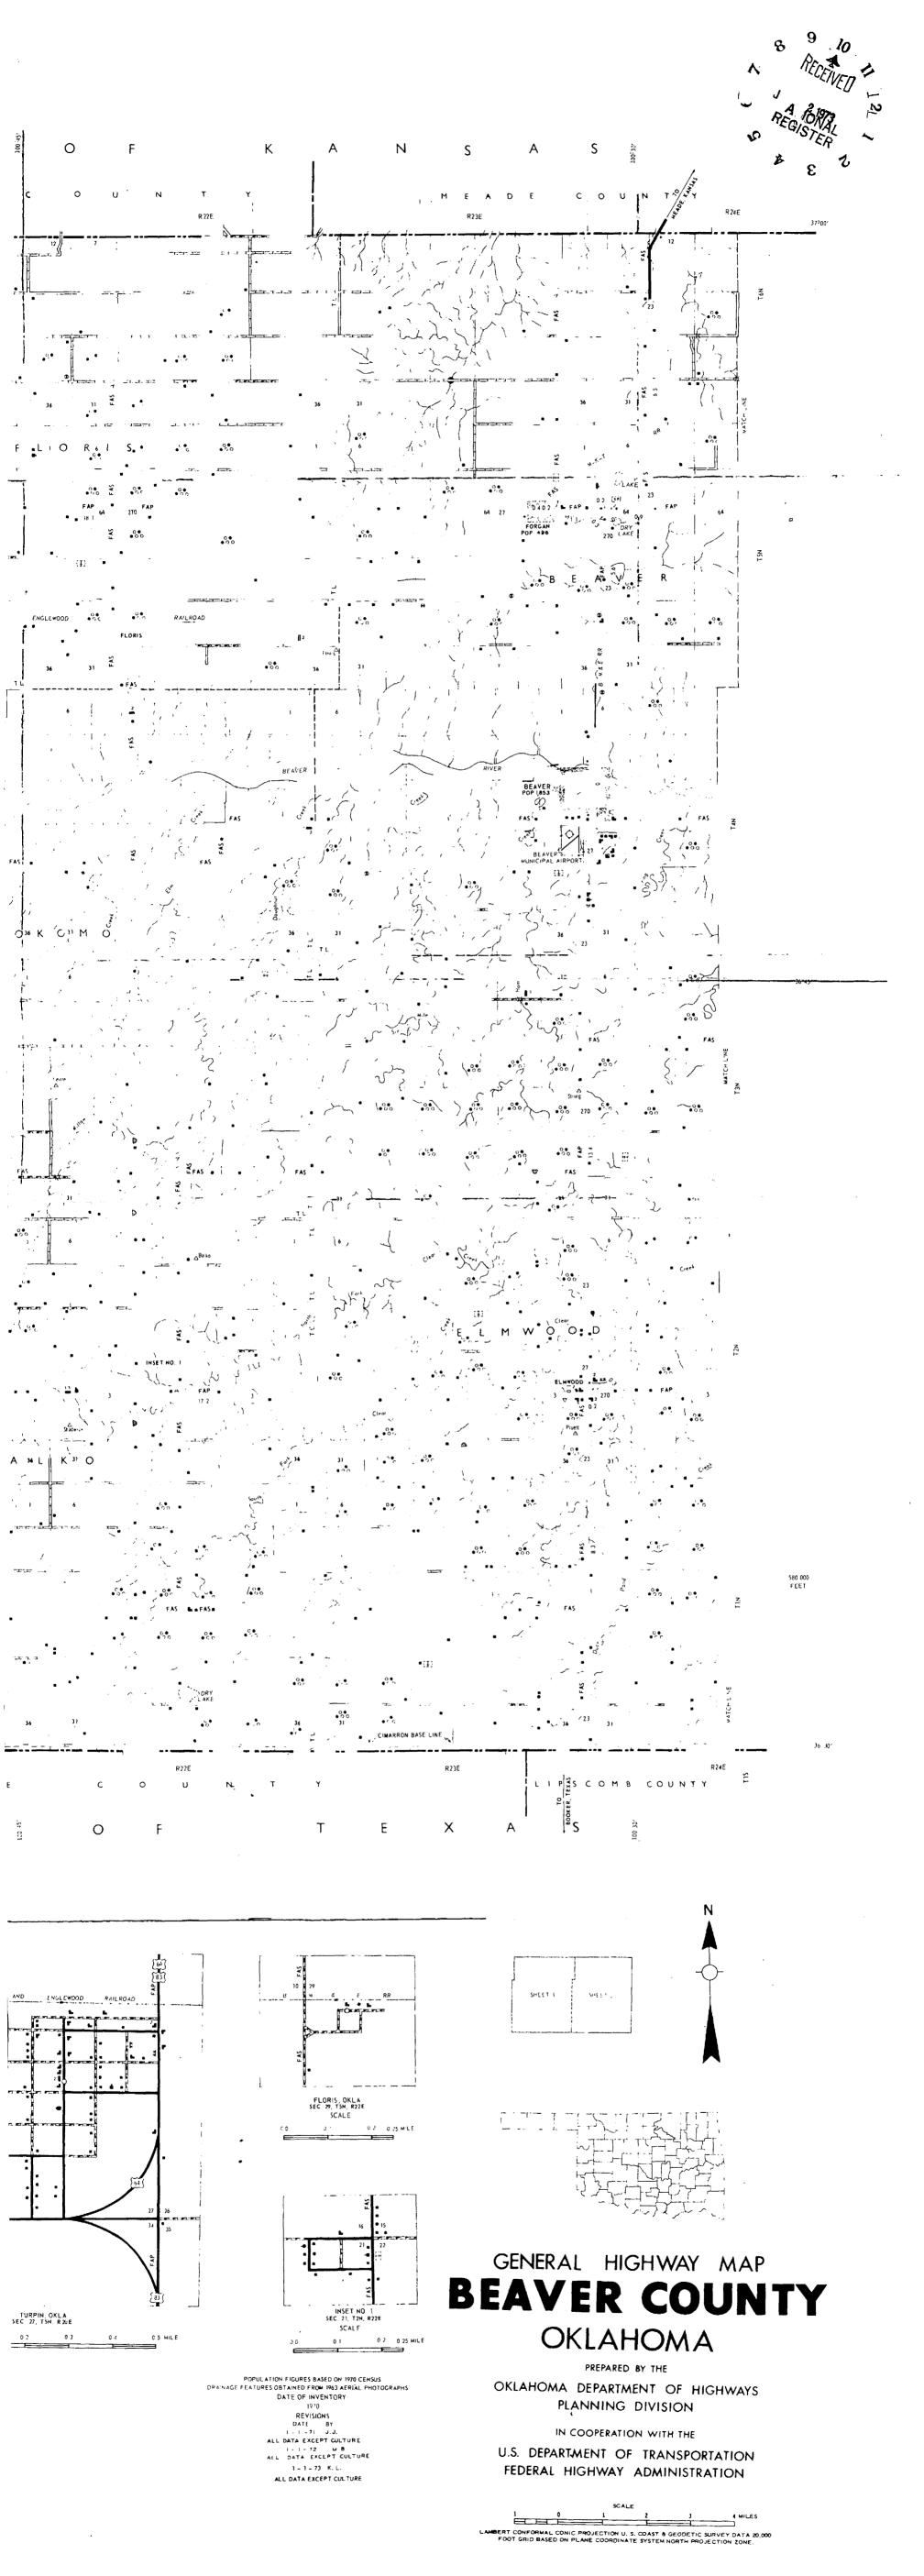

Lane Cabin

Lane whereby he waived his "squatter's right" to 160 acres of land in return for ownership of two blocks in the city-to-be. In the map of Beaver City as subsequently platted, two blocks are marked "Lane's Reserve."

The settlement did indeed boom. As ambitiously named Beaver City, it obtained a post office April 5, 1883. With a running start so far as organization was concerned, it naturally became the unofficial capital of Cimarron Territory and headquarters for the move to obtain legal status for it.

As word of potential home and farm sites spread to other parts of the country, of course, more and more people arrived. Jim Lane soon had competition. Four new sod houses were completed within a month of the platting of the town. Townsite agent Wm. Waddle built one of them - as a grocery. Within another month the town had twenty more "soddies" built or under construction. The first wooden structures appeared shortly. Beaver City soon had a livery stable, a saloon ... and a dance hall, the first in all No Man's Land. The town had arrived.

The Lane Cabin was later expanded. Two of the original sod rooms were incorporated into a larger house and given a new roof. Stuccoed on the outside, it still stands, a residence and a pioneer museum. All of the other Beaver City "soddies" have long since disappeared. For all its lack of contemporary glamor, then, the Lane Cabin remains as the first structure in the first permanent settlement of a true western No Man's Land.
