DESCRIPTION SUMMARY:

The William S. Smith house, also known as the Joseph Croswell house or the Phoebus house, is located in the small village of Oriole, Somerset County, Maryland. The two-story cross-shaped frame Queen Anne house, built about 1890, dominated by a pair of three-story entrance towers, is supported on a brick pier foundation. The frame dwelling is clad with a mixture of plain weatherboards, fish-scale shingles, and later asbestos siding. The steeply pitched gable roofs are sheathed in asphalt shingles. Sheltering the two entrances are turned post porches accented with delicate spindles brackets and rows of spindles under the eaves. Two-over-two sash windows, originally flanked by louvered shutters, light the first and second floors. The first floor plan involves two center rooms flanked by separate staircases on each side with a single room on the opposite side of each stair. Most of the original Victorian woodwork remains intact. The only outbuilding is a modern garage.

SIGNIFICANCE SUMMARY:

The William S. Smith House is significant for its architectural character. Built about 1890, the house is a modest example of a Queen Anne influenced building. The exterior displays a pair of square towers with pyramidal roofs, multiple roof lines, and the ubiquitous gable shingling. In Somerset County, however, the William S. Smith House is the most elaborate example of this style of architecture outside of Princess Anne, the county seat, and Crisfield, the largest town. Houses built in the Queen Anne can be found in these towns but in the rural regions, Queen Anne influences are limited generally to turn-of-the-century renovations of earlier houses.

Section number 7 Page 1GENERAL DESCRIPTION:

The William S. Smith House, also known historically as the Joseph Crosswell house or the Phoebus house, stands in the small village of Oriole, Somerset County, Maryland on the south side of Maryland Route 627. The house faces north with the principal gable roof oriented on an east/west axis.

Built around 1890, the two-story cruciform shaped Queen Anne frame dwelling is dominated by a pair of three-story towers that rise within the front corners of the cross plan. The house is supported by a brick pier foundation, and it is largely sheathed with a layer of asbestos shingles that cover the original weatherboards. The weatherboards are exposed within the porch areas, and the fish-scale shingles that distinguish the gable ends have not been covered over either. The steeply pitched asphalt shingle roof has extended eaves with exposed and decorated rafter feet. The pyramidal tower roofs are marked by kicked eaves, wooden finials, and weathervanes. Rising through the center of the house are two narrow brick chimneys, one of which retains a decorative corbelled cap.

The north (main) facade is a basically symmetrical five-bay elevation with a center gable-front bay of the cruciform plan house flanked by the two entrance towers. The projecting gable-front bay is pierced by single two-over-two sash windows on each floor. (Shutters survive although they are stored mostly in the attic and garage in preparation for repainting.) A smaller two-over-two sash window pierces the gable end to light the attic. Finishing the eave is a pierced bargeboard.

Flanking the projecting bay are the two towers, each containing an entrance on the first floor. The original partially glazed front doors remain in place. The east door is highlighted with colored glass upper entrances on both sides. The turned baluster handrails and the spindlework under the eaves remains intact as well. The second floor is lighted by two-over-two sash windows, while the third floor of each tower is marked by a small two-pane window.

The gable ends are largely alike with two-over-two sash windows piercing each floor. The eaves are extended and finished with pierced bargeboards.

The south side of the house is a relatively plain elevation with a central projecting bay. Two-over-two sash windows pierce the first and second floors as well as the gable end. Fishscale shingles remain exposed within the upper gable of the projecting bay. On the east side of the bay a single story shed roof extends to enclose a pantry and porch.

The interior of the house has changed little since the late nineteenth century and much of the original woodwork remains intact. The formal front entrance, located on the west side of the house, allows access to the main hall and principal stairway. A heavily turned newel post with a ball finial and a series of turned balusters anchor a molded handrail. The stringer is embellished with a scroll decoration. Opening off the hall are several four-panel doors framed by bulls-eye block surrounds.

The room farthest west, currently used as a bedroom, may have been a formal parlor, although its exact original use is uncertain. The room retains a period Victorian mantel; the dining room and living room are trimmed with the same bulls-eye block door and windows surrounds as well as ogee molded baseboards. A built-in cupboard flanks the dining room mantel.

The kitchen, located on the far east end of the house, is separated from the living room and dining room by a service stairway. The kitchen has been remodeled in the past fifteen years, but the built-in beaded board door cupboard remains in the northeast corner.

The second floor is divided in the same manner as the first floor, and the woodwork follows the same basic design. Metal floor vents remain in a few rooms. The open stairwell continues to an unfinished attic. The door at the head of the attic stair retains an oak grained back. Series of butted common rafters are stabilized by collar beams fastened with cut nails.

The only outbuilding is a mid-twentieth century garage which does not contribute to the significance of the house.

HISTORIC CONTEXT:

William S. Smith is credited with financing the construction of this house around 1890 after he received part of the family land through his father's will. William T. Smith bequeathed to his son William S. and his two other sons portions of the family land that had been occupied by the Smiths since the early nineteenth century. Comprising parts of "Littleworth," or "Brother's Agreement" and "Nicholson's Adventure," the land was divided by the three sons in December 1889 (SCL 5/692). William S. Smith presumably erected this house shortly afterwards, although he experienced difficult financial shortfalls around 1898 which forced his property into Somerset Court. In the settlement proceedings the property was described as the land on the "south side of the road leading to Deal's Island on the East side of the homeplace of William T. Smith with improvements ... and where on the said William S. Smith built a dwelling house (OTB 10/58)." Very little is recorded about William S. Smith, although the family had been prominent in the area since the early nineteenth century. In June 1898 the Smith house was sold by the estate trustee, H. Filmore Lankford, to Severn W. Crosswell and others for $800.00 (OTB 23/438). Joseph Crosswell, a member of the group that purchased the Smith lands, is thought to have lived on the property with his wife Beulah Phoebus, although he did not acquire full title to the house until 1920 (WJS 80/580). Not much is known about Joseph Crosswell other than the fact that the family operated a general store in the village during the early to mid twentieth century. The house remained in Crosswell and related Phoebus family hands until 1968 (ITP 245/453). The current owner purchased the house in 1978 (311/680).

Houses built in the Queen Anne style in rural Somerset County are few. The best examples are the Smith house, the Long house (S-287) near Hopewell, the Berry house (S-294) near Tulls Corner, and the Whittington Farm (S-276) near Marion. All were built about 1900 and have the typical multiple roof lines and multiple siding materials. Only the Smith house has towers. The best examples with Queen Anne renovations are the Adams Farm (S-338) in the vicinity of Princess Anne, and Cedar Hill (S-195) near Westover.
