DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Washington Prairie Methodist Church, on the exterior, is approximately 40 x 28 feet. The height at the roof peak is 27 feet 4 inches, and at the corners 17 feet 6 inches. The walls are of soft limestone and are approximately 1 foot 6 inches thick. The interior is 37 feet in length and 25 feet wide. The attic is about 10 feet 6 inches high at roof peak. The attic is nailed together with sawn lumber. The roof itself is not of truss construction but built on the common rafter system. Cedar shingles similar to the originals can be found on the roof.

The building's only entrance, located on a gable wall, faces to the southeast. At equal distances on the northeastern and southwestern walls are located three gothic windows with patterned-etched clear glass panes. The northwest wall is of solid limestone. The exterior wood trim is painted in two tones of gray.

The Church interior consists of one large room with two aisles leading to the pulpit which is centrally located at the far end of the room. A small open floor space is located immediately within the doorway. There are three rows of church pews consisting of nine pews along the outer walls and eight in the central section. Located on a raised platform, the pulpit, altar table, glass chalice and one chair (of the three original chairs) are surrounded by a semi-circular railing. Two pews, facing the pulpit, are located on either side of the platform. Darkly stained wainscot surrounds the lower section of the room with off-white painted plaster on the upper section of the walls and ceiling. The interior of the entrance double doors, pulpit and pews are painted and wood grained. Hanging from the ceiling towards the center of the room, two cast iron chandeliers hold four kerosene lamps each. The reed organ is located near the platform in the northwest corner. Near the outer walls, two wood stoves were located about a third of the way into the room. Only one stove similar and appropriate for the time period has been located and installed in the Church. Early ingrain carpeting covers the floor around the altar area. Modern woven carpet of early type covers the aisles.

In 1972 the Church and cemetery were restored by the Norwegian-American Museum, Decorah, Iowa. Utilizing photographs, written sources, oral interviews and historical archaeology, necessary data was collected for the refurbishing of the interior and exterior of the structure. Exterior refurbishing consisted of re-shingling the roof, pointing up the stone and repairing and painting the woodwork. Patterned after early photographs, wood steps leading to the entrance were reconstructed.

The refurbishing of the interior consisted of cleaning and slightly touching up artificially grained woodwork, repairing plaster walls and ceiling, and replacing missing materials from the Church. No guesswork was involved because at least one example of every type of object was still extant. From fragments of etched glass, a pattern was prepared for reproducing by the original method a number of the acid etched window panes. Remnants of ingrain carpeting enabled researchers to locate carpeting in similar colors and of the same time period. Missing parts of the chandeliers, none of which was without preserved counterparts, were reproduced. Collected data and descriptions were used as the basis for selecting the stove. One original altar chair remained.

Note: Window openings in the side walls appear to have been reworked from an original shape featuring the segmental arch. Portions of this wider arch form have been filled in to accommodate pointed-arch windows.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Washington Prairie Methodist Church has two-fold significance, historical and architectural. Historically it is considered the mother church of Methodism in Norway. The founder of the congregation, Ole Peter Petersen, returned to Norway in 1853 and founded the first Methodist congregation in that country. The members of the immigrant congregation continued to meet in homes for another ten years and then constructed with their own hands and from the surface limestone in the area the church which is now preserved by the Norwegian-American Museum. Ole Petersen later returned to the United States and continued to have periodic affiliation with the historic congregation in Iowa. From the same congregation came also Asle Knudsen, one of the great Methodist preachers of the pioneer period. The esteem in which the Methodists of Scandinavia hold the pioneer church at Washington Prairie was exemplified by the fact that the Bishop of the North European Methodist Conference journeyed from Stockholm to participate in the rededication of the building in 1972 when it was placed under the auspices of the Norwegian-American Museum.

The architectural significance of the Church lies largely in its exceptionally original condition. Having been used only quarterly from about 1888 to about 1920, when the Church was officially closed, it never underwent the modernization which has occurred in most early religious structures. Neither did it fall into total decay. A small group of late worshippers gave the roof a new coat of shingles at about the time the building was abandoned. They also placed tin shutters over the windows. Though the doors had been left open so rodents had taken over and vandals had broken the windows, nothing of the permanent inventar had been destroyed. A structural problem had developed over the entrance arch from the settling of the side walls, but it could be repaired by dismantling and resetting the stones in only a small section of the wall. Most of the major loose inventar--organ, lamps, altar table, chalice, etc.--had been stored in the boiler room of a church in the city of Decorah. All was made available to the Museum when it brought the Church back to its original state in the early 1970's.

The Washington Prairie Methodist Church is an exceptional document of indigenous stone architecture in the Upper Midwest as well as being a historic monument of international interest.
