The Old Cawker City Library building is a one-story structure designed in the Vernacular style of architecture. The rectangular building measures approximately 30 feet long and 20 feet wide and has no basement. The main entrance is located on the south side below a pedimented porch roof. The building is constructed of native limestone blocks laid in a crude running bond pattern. The stones are generally similar in size, uniform in height, and have broken faces, giving a rugged texture to the building. The quoining stones at the corners are similar to the stones of the exterior wall but in addition project from the wall surface. The roof is a hip style with the center portion flat. There are three small gables, one each located on the front and the two sides. A brick chimney protrudes from the roof at each of the end gables. Each of the gables is ornamented by a bargeboard with a lacelike bottom.

A porch structure is located on the south side at the main entrance. The porch roof is a steep gable pediment and is supported by four ornamental columns. The columns are paired on each side of the entrance and are a modified Corinthian style. Each column rests on a stone base block. Small circular openings occur in each gable end, probably to admit light into the attic. The main entrance door is a decorative panel door with glass panes and glass sidelights. Window openings are slender rectangles with shallow arched tops. The windows are of the double hung sash type. Projecting stone sills are located at the bottom of each window and a gently curved stone lintel is at the top. The window lintels are decorated with a small rectangular recess at each end.

The Cawker City Library is reportedly one of the Pirst small town public libraries in Kansas. The original library club was organized in 1874 by 16 Cawker City men who offered exclusive membership for $5.00 apiece. This revenue was used to purchase periodicals and books which were kept for several years in the home of one of the members, Dr. A. Patton. In 1877 the club decided to amend the by-laws and reduce the membership fee to $1.00, thus extending library privileges to more citizens. At this time the library material was transferred to the law offices of Judge Clark A. Smith and L. S. Tucker. By 1883 the membership had reached 125.

In November, 1883, the women of Cawker City took over the club at the request of the men, and the name was changed to "The Woman's Club." The library material was again moved, this time to the house of Dr. George W. Chapman who offered this space for one year. He also told the club he would donate his mineral collection, said to be worth $1,500, if the club would build a library building. In August, 1884, the women began raising money for such a facility. After approximately $1,000 had been donated, a lot was purchased and contracts were let to local men, John Rodgers, a carpenter, and William Foster a stone mason. Cornerstone ceremonies were Thanksgiving Day, November 27, 1884, and on April 29, 1885, The Woman's Club held its first meeting in the almost completed building. Dedication ceremonies were held July 4, 1885, at which time it was announced that the total cost of the building was $1,067.00. The club later changed its name to the "Woman's Hesperian Library Club" and obtained a new charter so the men who formed the first library club could be admitted as honorary members. The Hesperian library was housed in this building until September, 1970, when it was moved to new facilities. The old Cawker City Library building now houses the local historical museum. 🦟

This small building located in north central Kansas is an excellent example of early Vernacular architecture and is one of the oldest buildings in the state specifically erected for use as a library.
