DESCRIPTION SUMMARY

Woodstock is a gable-roof frame dwelling which stands on a high point of land surrounded by rolling farmland, and bounded on the west by U.S. Route 301. The house consists of a two-and-one-half story main block with exterior gable-end chimneys, built in the mid-nineteenth century, and a one-and-one-half-story wing. The westerly two bays of this five-bay wing, enclose an earlier freestanding building, a remnant of the older Timberly plantation; it is now connected to the main block by a later three-bay connecting link or hyphen. The house has simple but handsome interior trim, in the Greek Revival style, and has been recently and carefully restored. There are remnants of two old buildings just west of the house, and a twentieth century smoke house on the slope to the north.

SIGNIFICANCE

Woodstock is an outstanding example of a mid-nineteenth century plantation house with decorative elements in the Greek Revival style. The main block was probably built in the early 1850s by Washington Custis Calvert of Mount Airy; it was subsequently attached by means of a connecting hyphen to an older kitchen building on the property. In 1860 Woodstock became the home of James Beall Belt retired Clerk of the Prince George's County Court, and passed after his death to his son John W. Belt, who served also as Clerk of the Court. Woodstock exemplifies a house style typical of successful small plantations of the period; it is one of only three surviving examples in Prince George's County of this once popular Tidewater house style. It is in excellent condition and stands in a prominent location in functioning farmland, a visible landmark overlooking a much travelled highway. It is an important example of Prince George's County nineteenth century architectural history.

Prince George's County, MarylandDESCRIPTION

Woodstock is a gable-roof frame dwelling which consists of a two-and-one-half-story main block, with a two-part, one-and-one-half-story wing. It stands on a high point of land surrounded by rolling farmland, and overlooks U.S. Route 301 to the west. The main block is side gabled, 28 by 34 feet, three bays by two bays. Entrance is in the third bay of the main south facade through an eight-panel door (six small panels over two large ones) flanked by full-length green louvered shutters. A one-story hip-roof porch shelters this main south facade; it is supported by square posts with molded capitals and bases, embellished by large jig-sawn brackets, and rests on a concrete foundation. A rear door in the first bay of the north facade has six panels.

The siding of the main block is plain horizontal board with plain corner posts, all painted white. Windows are wood frame double hung sash with six lights over six, and narrow molded surrounds, and have dark green louvered shutters. The plain board cornice has crown molding and is slightly flared at the eaves, and is slightly flared at the eaves, and is not returned at the gable ends. The gable roof is covered with gray asphalt shingle. There are two (unmatched) tall exterior brick chimneys at the west gable end. Between the two stacks at third level is a small four over four window; in the corresponding position in the east gable end are two four over 4 windows. These stacks are laid in American bond, four courses of stretchers to one of headers. The southerly stack has weatherings above the second story, and has been widened by the addition of new brick, to accommodate a new heating system. The narrow northerly stack has no weatherings, and is enclosed at first story by the attached kitchen wing. The main block rests on a brick foundation which encloses a basement under the south half of the building; from this basement space, one can see the large hand-hewn sill beams, joined with mortise and tenon. Access to the basement is through a bulkhead between the two chimneys. A builder's trench is clearly visible just outside (north) of the north foundation wall of the basement.

Interior plan of the main block consists of side stair hall and connecting double parlors. The open string two-run staircase rises along the east (exterior) wall of the stairhall, then turns 90 degrees at a landing and reverses to the second floor. It has plain square balusters and a simple round rail. In place of a newel post is a plain carved post. The staircase has a paneled spandrel, and plain bracketed stair ends. The center section of each riser is painted black, as suggested by early layers of paint.

Two doorways lead from the stairhall westward into the two adjoining parlors. These parlors are connected by double doors which were folded back into the north parlor (dining room). Each leaf of the double door, like the principal south entrance door, has six small panels over two large ones. Identical wooden mantels frame the fireplaces in the two parlors: the mantel frieze has a rounded "pillow" projection, which is repeated (vertically) in the pilasters which flank the firebox.

Surrounds of doors and windows consist of an inner bead, broken (two-step) field and outer molding. Baseboards are molded; there are no molded cornices or chair rails. All interior doors in the main block hang on mid-nineteenth century "Baldwin" hinges. The lock-box on the main (south) door is marked "I. Walker VR".

Mantels in the bedrooms above the two parlors are identical to those in the parlors.<sup>1</sup> Moldings on the second story are similar to those on the first, but have an unbroken (one-stop) field. The staircase continues to the third floor. The second story north window which lights the stairhall is split by the landing between second and third floors.

Extending west from the main block and flush with its north facade, is a one-and-one-half-story two part kitchen wing, 16 by 30 feet. Construction details indicate that the westerly section is the oldest, and that the central or easterly section of the wing was later built as a hyphen to connect the older building to the main block.

The westerly (older) section of the wing (16 by 14 1/2 feet) is two bays wide with entrance in the second bay of its facade through a modern door (four small lights over four panels). There is a corresponding rear door on the north facade, which opens onto a high concrete stoop.<sup>2</sup> This small building rests on whole logs and has a very shallow crawl space underneath. From the upper-story room in the hyphen, one can observe the original exterior wide, hand-split board siding of the east gable end of the older building. Floor boards are wide and probably original; the framing is reinforced with brick <sup>1</sup>During restoration work in the 1970s, the mantel was removed from the south bedroom and installed in the dining room, the only room from which the mantel was missing. A new mantel was made for the south bedroom, identical to the other three.

<sup>2</sup>In the early twentieth century, a rear shed porch on the north facade of the wing had been enclosed to form a kitchen. This enclosed porch was removed during the restoration work of the 1970s, and the concrete stoop was constructed at that time.

nogging. Just south of the ridge at the west gable end is an exterior freestanding brick chimney, four courses of stretchers to each course of headers, with weatherings above the first story level.

This small structure is now joined to the main block by a three-bay-wide hyphen (16 by 15 1/2 feet), of the same depth as the older building. The hyphen is now used as a kitchen, while the older westerly section has been converted into a family room, and is paneled with narrow beaded wainscoting. A boxed staircase rises between the two sections, giving access to two small rooms, one above each section, connected by a batten door. Each of these rooms is lighted by a gable dormer on the south. Each dormer encloses a 6/6 window, has a molded cornice, and is sided with diagonal boards.

The two sections join to form a four-bay wing, 16 by 30 feet, sided with plain horizontal boards, narrower than those of the main block, all painted white. Windows are 6/6 double hung sash with plain board surrounds, and have dark green louvered shutters. There is a second door in the fourth bay of the south facade (second bay of the hyphen); it has one large pane of glass over three molded panels. The roof of the wing is covered with wooden shingles; it has a molded cornice, flared at the eaves like that of the main block. A one-story shed-roof porch, continues from the roofline to shelter the entire south facade of the wing. The porch is supported by plain square posts, and has a brick floor. The wing rests on a brick foundation topped by one course of rowlock, and encloses a shallow crawl space.

Woodstock stands on the highest point of land on a 5-acre parcel which was carved out of the original 320-acre farm. An unpaved drive leads east to the house from U.S. Route 301, which is the western boundary of the property. (The historic access to the house was from the old road to the east.) The drive ends just east of the house in a circle which encloses a large evergreen tree; a short distance northeast of the circle stands a very large holly, estimated to be 185 years old. Circa 20 feet southwest of the kitchen wing stands a massive red maple, estimated to be 210 years old. A linden tree near the west end of the house is also of great age, and is being evaluated for champion status.

The immediate grounds of the house are bounded by a rail fence in the north and west, and a split rail (snake) fence on the south; the fields outside these boundaries are devoted to sheep grazing. On the sloping ground in the field to the north is a twentieth century smoke house, gable-roofed with concrete block foundation. It has replaced an older smoke house which stood on a brick foundation still visible in the yard west of the house. Directly west of the house is a small square herb garden which marks the spot where an ice house once stood.

HISTORY AND SUPPORT

Woodstock stands on a tract known as Timberly, patented by Robert Ridgely in 1672.<sup>3</sup> Part of this tract, adjoining the tract called "Croom", belonged in the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries to Edward Scott. Scott's dwelling was on the Croom tract, but several farm buildings, including a small kitchen, stood on Timberly, which adjoined Croom on the west.<sup>4</sup>

A 220 acre portion of Timberly, known as the Woodstock farm, passed to Scott's son, Horatio C. Scott, a prominent merchant in the village of Upper Marlboro. After Edward Scott died in 1851, Horatio C. Scott (who lived in the old Wardrop House, PG #79-28, sold the Woodstock farm (in 1853) to Washington Custis Calvert, one of the seven sons of Edward H. Calvert of Mount Airy. Washington Calvert had married in 1851, and had received in trust 100 acres of Mount Airy which adjoined Scott's Timberly. It is almost certain that it was Calvert who built the main block of the house at Timberly as his home.<sup>5</sup>

The new house was typical of small plantation houses of the mid-nineteenth century; it consisted of a side stairhall and double parlors, warmed by fireplaces on the exterior wall. The trim of the house was plain, but handsome, Greek Revival style, with broken field moldings, and carved "pillow" projections highlighting the wooden mantels. A pre-existing kitchen building, with boxed staircase and sleeping loft above, was put to use by Calvert; it stood 15 feet from his new dwelling.

Washington Calvert lived only a short time in this house. His wife died in 1857, and in 1860 he sold his entire farm (220 acres of Timberly and 100 adjoining acres of Mt. Airy) to James Beall Belt, retired Clerk of the County Court. Calvert remarried and (apparently) left Prince George's County.<sup>6</sup>

James Beall Belt had served as Clerk of the Court from 1838 to 1851. He owned a house and lot in Upper Marlboro where he resided, and also a store house, granary and office where he operated a mercantile business. His wife had died in 1859, and in the following year he moved with his son, John W. Belt, into Washington Calvert's house on Timberly which he renamed Woodstock. Belt continued to operate the granary, store house and office in Upper Marlboro, trading as James B. Belt and Son.<sup>7</sup>

After the Civil War, Belt fell into financial difficulties; he mortgaged and remortgaged his Woodstock farm. His financial difficulties were still unresolved at the time of his death in 1882. By his will he devised all of his estate, "the farm on which I now reside called Woodstock, together with all stock, crops, utensils, machinery then upon it, also all lots in Upper Marlboro, and all interest in the mercantile business carried on under the name of James B. Belt and Son," to his son, John Williamson Belt and his wife, Mary D. Belt, for their lives, in trust for his grandson (their son), James B. Belt.<sup>8</sup>

In the year of his father's death, John W. Belt was appointed to his father's former position as Clerk of the Court, a position which he held until his death in 1896. He also turned over the management of his store house, granary and office in Upper Marlboro to Hamilton Hall, and moved his family from their town dwelling to his father's house at Woodstock. He was also able to settle the liens on the Woodstock property by offering it for sale (by decree of the Equity Court) and purchasing it himself. It was advertised at this time (1889) as "320 acres, the land now occupied by John W. Belt, improved by a large and comfortable dwelling house and all necessary barns and out-buildings."<sup>9</sup>

John W. Belt died in 1896, and was buried with his parents at Trinity Church, Upper Marlboro. His estate was administered by his brother-in-law, attorney Caleb Clark Magruder (II), and Woodstock was conveyed to his son, James B. Belt. The younger Belt predeceased his mother, however, and consequently Woodstock was devised by her will (1924) to her nephew, Caleb Clarke Magruder III. It remained Magruder's home until his death in the 1940s.<sup>10</sup>

When the present owners purchased Woodstock from the Magruder family in 1973, the house had stood vacant and boarded up for several years, and was in deteriorating condition. The new owners undertook major restoration work, removing the shed porch which had served as a kitchen, and installing a new kitchen in the hyphen. The house is now in excellent condition, and is a prominent and visible landmark high on a hill east of U.S. Route 301. Woodstock is a significant example of a mid-nineteenth century plantation house style of southern Prince George's County, of which only a few survive.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>11</sup>Prince George's County Deed #4245:414. Recent survey work in Prince George's County has identified only two other buildings of similar plan: Bellevue (84-20), and the Turner House (87B-5). To each of these houses there is attached lower kitchen wing which partially covers the exterior brick chimneys. In the case of the Turner House, the kitchen is a considerably later addition. Six other mid-nineteenth century dwellings [Beuna Vista (70-17), Solitude (77-5), the Nourse House (77-11), the Coftren House (86A-10), the Plantation (86A-16) and Kalaird (86B-9)] are similar to Woodstock, but have interior chimneys and/or alterations which have significantly changed the lines of the building.
