Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Fairfield Historic District is an early twentieth century residential area located along a low ridge south of downtown Shreveport. All of the 253 contributing elements date from the period 1900 to 1936. Because it has an intrusion rate of only 9%, the district easily retains its historic character. Also, alterations to contributing buildings have been fairly minimal.

The Fairfield area is shown on an 1864 Confederate map as a scattering of houses and dependencies in an otherwise heavily wooded area. None of these structures remain today. In the late nineteenth century the City of Shreveport expanded to the south and gradually annexed the area which became Fairfield. Acts of annexation took place in 1898 and 1908. Development in the area was greatly spurred by an electric streetcar system which began operation in 1890.

Fairfield was Shreveport's most prosperous suburb and its development coincided with the meteoric rise of the local oil industry. Although oil was first discovered in 1905, it was not produced in really great quantities until after about 1910. It is interesting to note that it was during this second decade of the twentieth century that 52% of the district's buildings were constructed. Although it is tempting to label Fairfield an "oil suburb," only a handful of its affluent residents were actually "oil rich." Others made their money in other ways. But it is fair to say that the growth of Fairfield represented an era of general prosperity in which the oil boom was the most important factor.

Essentially the Fairfield district consists of two principal elements: (1) Fairfield Avenue itself, a grand rue running along a ridge and forming the "spine" of the district; and (2) the streets on either side. Although there are big houses on the principal side streets, the biggest, most palatial houses are along Fairfield Avenue. All have large lots and some occupy the equivalent of an entire city block. The well treed side streets have more conventional houses with more conventional lot sizes. The average lot is 40 to 50 feet wide and 100 to 120 feet deep. Even on the side streets the houses are relatively large. For example, about 70% have two or more stories.

THE BUILDING STOCK

Queen Anne Revival (9%):

Although the district's "Queen Anne" houses tend to be above average in size, their designs are fairly standard for the period. None feature a turret. The typical "Queen Anne" house in Fairfield has an asymmetrical front with a projecting bay under a gable on one side and a gallery on the other. Most examples are single story and similar to contemporaneous farmhouses in the region.

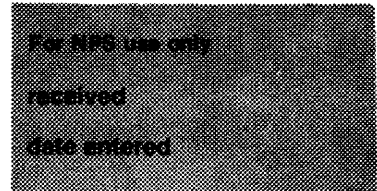

Four-square (44%) and Bungalow (16%):

The predominant type of house along the side streets in the Fairfield area is the four-square. Most of the four-squares have hipped roofs, narrow-lapped wood siding, two large symmetrically placed double-hung windows on the second floor, a one story porch running the front of the house, and a front door (often with side lights, corner lights, and transom) counterbalanced by another double-hung window. Within this fairly restrictive description there are many variations in treatment. A roof may or may not have a dormer. Occasionally the roof form is changed to a front facing gable or gambrel. Other variations include the pane pattern of the windows (diamond or rectangular), the type of porch roof (flat, shed or pedimented), and the type of porch columns (Tuscan, Craftsman, brick piers, etc.). Although the house type may seem undistinguished, its treatment is rich and varied. A number of the houses are more four-squarish than four-square. That is, they have a basic box form, but deviate from the four-square by being more expansive or having a gabled projection over part of the porch.

7. Description (cont'd)

Bungalows are often the dominant house type in other period neighborhoods in the region. But this is not the case in Fairfield, where they number only 16% of the overall building stock. Fairfield's bungalows are similar to other examples across the state, and hence no further description is needed.

Twentieth Century Eclectic Houses (22%):

These tend to be located along principal streets such as Fairfield Avenue, Boulevard Street or Robinson Place. Unlike the four-squares, bungalows, and "Queen Anne" houses, many of the eclectic houses were designed by architects. Practitioners included the prolific Edward F. Neild, Dewey Somdal, John Y. Snyder, Phillip Rosenblath, and Sam Wiener, who later became a pioneer in introducing the International Style into Louisiana. Eclectic houses tend to be larger than even the biggest four-squares. Styles include neo-classical, Colonial (or Georgian Revival), Mediterranean (or Italian Renaissance), French Renaissance, Tudor, and Gothic. Most of the district's eclectic houses are evocative rather than archaeological, relying upon borrowed details and symmetrical or asymmetrical massing to achieve their effects. The exception to this is 3101 Fairfield (inventory #277), which looks as if it really could be a late Georgian manor house, at least from a distance.

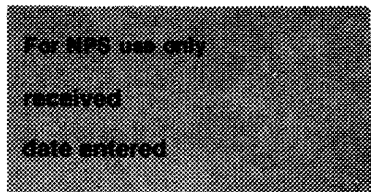

INTRUSIONS

Little building occurred in the district after 1936. As a result, Fairfield's intrusion rate is very low -- only 9%. To put this in perspective, one need only note that intrusion rates in some Louisiana Register districts have ranged as high as 36%. Moreover, virtually all the intrusions are low in scale and blend well with the historic streetscape. The exception to this is St. Mark's Episcopal Church (inventory #269), a very large brick and limestone building constructed between 1950 and 1959. Despite its late date, the church is elaborately treated with Middle Gothic elements and one would never know that it is not over 50 years old. Hence, in our opinion, St. Mark's is not detrimental to the district's character because it supports the area's eclectic architectural heritage.

INTEGRITY

For the most part, the district's contributing elements have not been greatly altered over the years. The only change one sees with any frequency is the installation of substitute siding. Generally this has not had a significant visual impact upon the buildings in question. Moreover, less than 10% of the district's contributing elements have been treated in this way.

Contributing Elements

The Fairfield Historic District is significant as a superior example of an early twentieth century neighborhood (i. e., up to 1936). There are certain elements (see Item 8) which give it this superior status, but the district should also be viewed as a tout ensemble of its period. Other 50+ year old elements which do not directly contribute to the district's superiority are important in their own right because they help establish Fairfield's identity and credentials as a period neighborhood. Hence any 50+ year old structure which has not been altered beyond recognition is considered a contributing element for purposes of this application.

Stylistic Breakdown

Queen Anne Revival	9%

Photography Note: The distances between houses coupled with heavily forested lots made it impossible to get many good general views along Fairfield Avenue. However, the avenue's character is well illustrated in the numerous individual building photos.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph) Criterion C

The Fairfield Historic District is locally significant in the area of architecture as a very superior early twentieth century residential area within the context of northern Louisiana. (This includes the parishes of East Carroll, West Carroll, Madison, Richland, Morehouse, Franklin, Caldwell, Ouachita, Union, Lincoln, Jackson, Bienville, Claiborne, Red River, Webster, Bossier, DeSoto and Caddo.)

There are a goodly number of older residential areas in this region, but the vast majority are of little value as architectural groupings. Generally, one finds bungalows or fairly plain Colonial Revival cottages in combination with houses from the 1940s or '50s or even later. Indeed, very few neighborhoods have a sufficient concentration of older houses to even be considered for National Register district status.

The Fairfield District is conspicuous among this group in the following respects:

- (1) It contains the region's only major concentration of American four-square houses.
- (2) Most importantly, its collection of twentieth century eclectic revival style houses is truly outstanding.
- (3) The district is very cohesive, with an intrusion rate of only 9%.

The so-called "American four-square" is found in many towns and cities in northern Louisiana. It is a very standard archetype which usually represents an upper middle class owner. One does not generally find "four-squares" in groups in the region. Instead, they occur as isolated examples, interruptions in the bungalow streetscape. Fairfield is one of only two places where "four-squares" or similar two story "four-squarish" houses occur in relatively large numbers. Houses of this ilk dominate in many parts of the district and account for almost half the district's contributing elements. Moreover, some of the "four-squarish" houses are very large with landmark status in their own right (for example, inventory #164).

The eclectic revival styles of the early twentieth century such as Tudor or Renaissance are well represented in the district. Virtually all buildings of this ilk are worthy examples. None are mere cottages; each is a strong and commanding stylistic statement. Moreover, a good many of them possess significant individual distinction. Ten would certainly classify as mansions, which can be seen in their decorous articulation and broad palatial lines. Examples include inventory numbers 177, 181, 199, 200, 202, 226, 271, 273, 276, and 277. There is no doubt that any of these structures would qualify for an individual listing in the Register. In addition, the district also contains thirty or so second-rate examples which would be first-rate almost anywhere else. Examples include inventory numbers 31, 75, and 204. Although these structures are important to the scene in Fairfield, they are not

Boundary Justification:

Essentially the district boundaries were drawn to encompass the mixture of pretentious eclectic houses and "American Four-Square" houses which make up the district's character. In all cases the choice of boundary lines was fairly obvious. North of the district is an area of modern hospital and hotel development. East of the district is a modern commercial artery which gives way to an area of mixed bungalows and later development. South of the district is an area which was developed largely after World War II. West of the district is an area of mixed commercial and residential development. Predominantly low in scale, most of it is slated for demolition to provide for the construction of Interstate 49. For the record, this area is nondescript, and although it contains some older houses (mainly bungalows), they are not sufficiently concentrated nor of sufficient quality to justify extending the district boundaries.

Boundary Description Note:

Please refer to the enclosed to scale map for delineation of boundaries. Boundary lines follow either property lines or curb lines.
