DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

In original condition this building had a flat roofline and wrought iron balconies at the second floor windows. The Wolff House is now an extremely fine masonry building (the date of which is undetermined) which has nearly Georgian proportions. It is completely symmetrical on all sides in fenestration and detail. Windows are double-hung sash with panelled wooden surrounds, radiating brick voussoirs and stone There are nine windows on the main facade in addition sills. to the single entranceway with transom above. The roof is a hip of steep pitch with a small gable at the front centrally The gable contains a louvered opening probably to placed. allow light and air to enter the attic space. Chimneys are of brick and located on the extreme north and south sides of the roof. The house has a wide veranda extending the entire length of the east facade and extending back two-thirds of the way on the north and south sides. The veranda runs between the slender square supporting posts chamfered on the upper portions, and bracketed to the roof at the top. The pattern of the balustrade is a plain spindle post and the veranda is five bays wide across the front. The house rests on brick piers only a few inches above the ground level and the stair to the veranda is only two steps high. The brickwork is laid in common band with a random pattern of glazed stretchers; there is, however, a set pattern of their placement in the voussoirs.

The character of the Johnson-Wolff House changed with its ownership in 1893. Having been constructed approximately eight years earlier during the ownership of Leon Lopez (1883-1885) for use as employee housing by the Plant Steamship Company, the building was awkward in appearance with a flat roof and traces of Latin influence in the exterior ornamentation. In 1893, with its purchase by Johnson, a high hipped roof and central pediment were added, some of the ornamentation was removed and the appearance of the building was generally chastened. His somewhat minor alterations changed an undistinguished building into a dignified residence which remains virtually unchanged today.

Captain Henry L. Johnson, a Norwegian seaman sailing out of Boston, came to Port Tampa in 1893. Previously the captain of his own four-masted schooner, Johnson became a pilot in the Tampa Bay area and saw service during the Spanish-American War. During Captain Johnson's lifetime, the house became a center for social activity and entertaining in Port Tampa. Johnson was also a charter member of the Calumet Club, one of the earliest civic and social clubs in Captain Johnson died somewhat of a herd's death: Tampa. during the influenza epidemic of 1917, Johnson insisted on using his automobile to carry victims to the hospital and repeated warnings finally bore fruit when he succumbed to the disease.

The Johnson-Wolff House has remained in the same family since 1893 (the present owner, Ethel Wolff is Capt. Johnson's daughter). None of the changes made by Captain Johnson added to or were necessitated by functional requirements; rather his alterations were motivated by the New Englander's taste which he brought with him. Although there were once many fine residences in Port Tampa, this is one of the few remaining examples.
