The Meredith Cotton and Woolen Manufacturing Company was founded in 1811 and constructed a wooden mill which burned in 1823. When the Secretary of the U.S. Treasury, Louis McLane, conducted a survey of American Manufacturing in 1831, the return from Meredith, N.H. included the "Avery Factory Company," so-called for the agent who operated the mill, and stated that a brick mill has been raised in 1823 after the loss of the first mill. The recollections of N.H. Baldwin, published locally in 1884, state that the low building was in full operation by 1828.

An engraved view on a Map of Balknap County New Hampshire published in 1859 shows the building in its original condition. At each end of the roof a small stove chimney can be seen in the illustration, as can the original bell cupola. The present cupola appears to be a modern reproduction of the earlier form, but contains the original mill bell and framework. The bell, itself, is said to have been recast by an apprentice of Paul Revere, from the metal of the bell used in the earlier mill. The stair tower has been altered by the addition of a door to its facade at each story sometime before 1875, when its present appearance can be seen on an insurance survey drawing now owned by the Merrimack Valley Textile Museum, N. Andover, Mass.

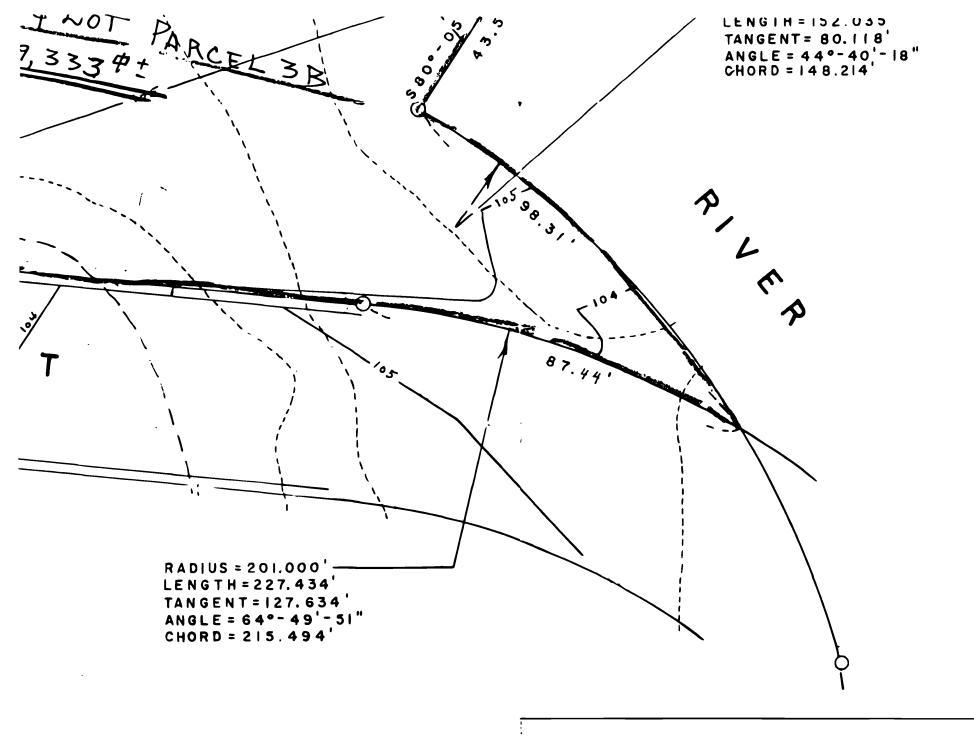

A brick and wooden building which houses a power plant of three turbines, replaced the earlier power systems about 1900. While these buildings obscure a portion of the rear of the mill_building_itself; they represent the continued alteration which was necessary to maintain this example of industrial architecture as a viable factory building into this century. The later power system is still extant and operable, and the interior of the main structure is almost completely original. An elevator has been inserted between floors at one end of the mill, but the original floor framing is extant elsewhere throughout. The building exhibits joisted floor construction in all its open ceiling, rather than the slow-burn construction common to almost all later This framing method and the roof frame of the attic story, which is equally original, are typical of the first phase of mill architecture throughout New England.

The location of the so-called Belknap-Sulloway mill, named for later owners of the building, was original a small village of Meredith Bridge in Meredith, N. H. Its location along the Winipesaukee River bank acted as the center around which modern Laconia was built. Located directly opposite the Busiel mill, a mid-nineteenth century example of the developments of industrial architecture, the Belknap Sulloway mill was much obscured by later buildings. The Urban Renewal project of which both mills are a part has cleared the less significant wooden buildings which surrounded these buildings, opening them to view once more. Today they occupy their original sites along the river and form a focal point for the modern redevelopment of Laconia.
