The Goldendale library is a rectangular brick building about 50' x 80' in a pleasant residential neighborhood near downtown Goldendale. The building has a gable roof of composition shingles with parapets at the gable ends. This feature is repeated on a small extension for the main entry on the south facade. Fenestration consists entirely of one-over-one double hung windows, with larger ones in front on the south facade. Each gable end has a circular opening for attic ventilation. The interior has been somewhat modernized, but the original walls remain in place. The main public area is reached by stairs which are partly outside and partly inside the building. Below this area is a daylight basement.

Verbal boundary description: Lots 10, 11, and 12 in Block 23 of John J. Golden's Central Addition to Town of Goldendale.

8. SIGNIFICANCE

Specific dates 1913

Builder/Architect Doyle & Paterson

a. History

The site of the library was purchased from James and Amanda Stackhouse in 1912 in anticipation of a Carnegie construction grant. The purchaser and the driving force behind the establishment of a library was the Women's Association. This organization still exists as a chapter of the Federated Women's Clubs. The building was constructed in 1914, two years after the land purchase. The architect was Doyle and Paterson of Portland, Oregon. The first book in the new library was Mill on the Floss, and the library still keeps a copy of this book in its collection as a tie to the past. In 1973 the library joined the Fort Vancouver Regional Library Association.

b. Evaluation of Significance

This building is a good, unaltered example of a small Carnegie Library, and it has played a significant role in the intellectual and cultural history of the community. Arthur E. Doyle of the firm of Doyle and Patterson was the leading architect of Portland, Oregon, for many years. One of his most significant works is the Carnegie-financed Central Building of the Multnomah Public Library in that city.
