Fort Cobb was never much to look at. Nor, for that matter, was it ever much to live in. Rather a temporary affair to begin with, it was abandoned, occupied, left deserted, re-occupied spasmodically, and only partly rebuilt before final abandonment, all in but a few months more than nine years.

Picket houses chinked with clay and roofed with sod, in the common plains frontier manner, accounted for most of the soldiers barracks and officers quarters. They were neatly built and fairly livable, when the weather cooperated, but still crude. The post's only stone building was built for the commanding officers. Walls of cottonwood poles provided a minimum of safety.

When the Tenth Cavalry returned to the burned-out ruins of Fort Cobb after the Civil War, soldiers thatched the stone building for a commissary, repaired a few of the log and adobe huts, erected half-dugouts for additional barracks. It was these dugouts, roofed with canvas, comfortable enough in dry weather, that became water reservoirs when the rains came in late 1868 and contributed to General Sheridan's decision to abandon the site for good.

Today, a century later, there are no physical remains to remind one of the important fort that was for a time the farthest west of any military post in the Indian Territory.

No. 8. Significance

Fort Cobb

For the nine-plus years it existed, however, a period that spanned the Civil War, the "temporary" post played an important role in the slow pacification of the Southern Plains Indians and the protection of both white settlers in Texas and friendly Indian tribes in the eastern half of Indian Territory. It was established October 1, 1859, by Major William H. Emory, on the west side of Pond (now Cobb) Creek, about three miles west of the Wichita Agency it was intended to protect. (The site is about one mile east of the present town of Fort Cobb. Oklahoma.) Outbreak of the Civil War and the withdrawal of Union troops from Indian Territory led to a brief occupation by Confederate forces from Texas. However, Confederate occupation was only nominal and sporadic. The absence of any authority contributed to the area's most vicious battle which, ironically, did not involve whites at all. In October 1862 a band of Tonkawas, widely believed by other Indians to be cannibalistic, were set upon near the fort and slaughtered almost to the last woman and child. (The nearby agency was burned for good measure.)

The end of the war brought troops back briefly to Fort Cobb and the re-establishment of Indian agencies for the Kiowas/Comanches and for the Wichitas. A few war-minded bands were raiding south and west into Texas, causing trouble for all the tribes, but most of the Indians were gradually reconciling themselves to peaceful co-existence with the whites. Treaties in Kansas -- on the Little Arkansas River in 1865 and on Medicine Lodge Creek in 1867 -- were establishing the pattern of things to come. By June 1868 three-fourths of the Kiowas and most of the Comanches had separated themselves from the war bands and gone to Fort Larned, Kansas, to demonstrate their peaceful intentions.

General Sheridan nevertheless ordered the punitive expedition of General Custer for late 1868, resulting in Custer's Battle of the Washita with the Cheyennes. It was bitter medicine indeed for the Indians to swallow, particularly those already inclined toward peace. But they had no real alternative. The December assemblage merely sealed their fate. The abandonment of Fort Cobb in favor of Fort Sill thus represented something of a symbolic page-turning, the closing of a chapter of hostility and the opening of a new chapter of at least grudging accommodation and adaptation.

Promptly at 2 o'clock we formed in battalions of three companies each on the parade ground and rode in front of the officers - Gens. Sheridan, Custer, Hazen and our regimental officers. About fifty feet to their right stood the Indian chiefs, Satanta, Lone Wolf of the Kiowas and Ten Bears, a Comanche chief. A son of Satanta was also with them. The Indians were on horseback and wore the chiefs headdress of beads and feathers.

Satanta's son had on pants and shirt and a red and black blanket over his shoulders. He is his father's messenger and a fine looking boy, straight as an arrow and appears about 20 years old. Satanta is quite large and very strongly built, much more noble looking than the others who are darker and just ordinary looking Indians, only finely dressed.

Thus did an army private, D. L. Spots, in his Journal for Saturday, December 19, 1868, describe a final day of glory in the brief, but exciting--and not insignificant--life of Fort Cobb. It was an impressive assemblage. In and about the post parade ground were some 3,000 Kiowas and Comanches, hundreds of Wichitas, Cheyennes, Arapahoes and other tribes, some nominally friendly, other fiercely resentful because of the devastating early morning attack a few weeks before by General Custer on the sleeping Cheyennes camp of Chief Black Kettle a hundred miles to the northwest. Facing them were some 2,000 troops led by Generals Philip H. Sheridan, George A. Custer and William B. Hazen.

The hostiles had been cowed and peace on the Southern Plains had been, for all practical purposes, achieved. Ironically, however, Fort Cobb itself had outlived its usefulness. In the last week of December the rains came and the post became a sea of mud. Shortly General Sheridan was to follow the advice of earilier military men on the scene and establish a permanent base near Medicine Bluff in the Wichita Mountains about 30 miles to the south. Stakes for Camp Wichita (present Fort Sill) were driven January 8, 1869. On March 13, Fort Cobb was abandoned.
