DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (If known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Port Gibson battlefield has changed little since May of 1863. The ravines are still filled with vines and immense canebrakes, and the ridges are as steep-sided as when the Federal troops tried to scale them. The deep road beds have not changed over the years, and relics of the battle are still occasionally found on their surfaces. Bridges have been added where once streams had to be forded.

The Shaifer house is still in use, serving as the clubhouse of the Shaifer Hunting Club. It is a two-story frame structure made almost entirely of cypress, with walls showing scars from missiles fired during the battle. Magnolia Church, where the Confederates placed their first line of defense, is no longer standing. Only its brick foundation and the cistern remain.

The Port Gibson battlefield is one of the Civil War sites in Mississippi that has remained virtually unchanged, since the terrain over which the battle was fought has been little affected by subsequent growth and development.

Four miles west of the town of Port Gibson, Mississippi, on May 1, 1863, the first shots of the battle of Port Gibson were fired, opening an engagement that lasted for eighteen hours. In this hard fought battle, 8,000 Confederates, led by Brigadier General John S. Boyen, fought a holding action against the Federal forces under the command of Major General Ulysses S. Grant, who had 24,000 men supported by sixty field guns. Grant had made a forced march south on the Louisiana side and had succeeded in crossing the Mississippi River at Bruinsburg in the largest amphibious landing prior to World War II. Once ashore the Federals marched rapidly eastward in an attempt to reach the high bluffs ahead of the Confederate Army of Tennessee.

Bowen had repeatedly warned Major General John C. Pemberton, commander of the Department of Mississippi and East Louisiana, of the Federals' push south of Vicksburg, but his words had fallen on deaf ears. Pemberton had been thoroughly confused by Major General William T. Sherman's feint north of Vicksburg at Haynes' Bluff. The Confederate Commander had also sent his cavalry after Colonel Benjamin Grierson's Federal cavalry, which was raiding through the center of the state. If Bowen had been properly reinforced by troops from Vicksburg, the Battle of Port Gibson may have had a different outcome.

Two brigades, those of Brigadier General Edward D. Tracy, who was to die early in the action, and Brigadier General William E. Baldwin, made a forced march from Vicksburg to reinforce Bowen, but were exhausted from the forty-four mile march that required twenty-seven hours. It was a case of too little, too late, for Grant had gained his beachhead and was moving rapidly inland. Bowen had posted Brigadier General Martin E. Green's brigade along a north-south ridge across the southerly road running from Port Gibson to Rodney by way of the A. K. Shaifer house and Magnolia Church. The center of Green's brigade was at Magnolia Church. Tracy's brigade was to guard the Bruinsburg Road approximately 1,000 yards to the north of the southerly road and behind the Shaifer house.

Shortly after midnight, May 1, 1863, General Green rode forward from Magnolia Church to the Shaifer house to warn his pickets to be especially alert. While engaged in conversation with the ladies of the Shaifer household who were hurriedly loading a wagon with effects, Green told them that their haste was unnecessary since the Union forces could not possibly advance to that point before daylight. Green had hardly spoken when the Confederate pickets fired on the Federal vanguard. As the minie balls began to strike the house, Green's reassurances had little effect on the Shaifer ladies, who whipped their horses frantically down the road toward Port Gibson.

During the night, shots were exchanged but no major engagement was precipitated. Dawn revealed a very broken terrain to the troops of Brigadier General James A. Carr, senior Union commander of Major General John A. McClernand's XVIII Corps, on the field. The area was a maze of ridges, running in all directions and separated by steep-sided ravines filled with impenetrable growths of trees, vines and immense canebrakes.

Hoping to hold the Federal army until reinforcements under Major General William W. Loring could arrive from the Big Black River, the Confederates dug in along the Bruinsburg Road and the Magnolia Church ridge. Action commenced north of the Shaifer house and just south of the Bruinsburg Road when the Federals under Brigadier General Peter J. Osterhaus met Tracy's brigade of Confederates. Tracy was killed in the opening engagement and command fell upon Colonel Isham Garrott.

On the southerly road the brigades of Brigadier General William L. Benton and Colonel William M. Stone, supported by that of Brigadier General Alvin P. Hovey, fought the determined but much weaker Confederates of Green's brigade. Green held his line until around 10:00 a.m., when he was forced across Centers Creek to the high ground of the east bank. Green's withdrawal was covered by Baldwin's brigade just arriving from Vicksburg. Baldwin took over the defenses of the road while Green reorganized. Bowen then sent Green to the north flank to assist Garrott.

It is interesting to note that in his reports written immediately after the battle, General Hovey stated that his men were fighting against superior numbers. He did not know at the time that it was he who outnumbered the Confederates over three to one.

Bowen's fourth brigade, under Colonel Francis M. Cockrell, arrived from Grand Gulf about noon and was placed in line along Centers Creek to the left of Baldwin. As the Federal advance of Hovey and Carr came under the fire of Baldwin's troops, a severe ninety minute fight ensued. Bowen then sent two of Cockrell's regiments to turn McClernand's right flank, and the Missourians overran Colonel James R. Slack's brigade, but they in turn came under the fire of Brigadier General Stephen G. Burbridge's brigade, which had been brought into the line. Cockrell's Missourians also were in the enfiladed fire of Hovey's field pieces.

By now Grant was sending brigade after brigade into the Federal lines. The right wing of the Confederate defenses began to fail, followed by the collapse of the rest of the line. Bowen retreated in good order, resisting until dark, when pursuit ended. Accompanied by three brigades, Bowen crossed Bayou Pierre. Baldwin's brigade withdrew through Port Gibson and across Little Bayou Pierre. The suspension bridges over these streams were burned by the Confederate rearguard.

This Union victory at Port Gibson gave Grant the foothold on the Mississippi side of the river that terminated a year of failures and subsequently led to the capture of Vicksburg, his ultimate goal.

Map 5. Battle of Port Gibson; action from 4:30 p.m. to 5:30. Grant had sent in Logan's division of McPherson's corps to strengthen McClernand's drive. A general attack spearheaded by John E. Smith's brigade started at 5 p.m. and resulted in the defeat of the Confederate right flank followed by the collapse of the rest of the line. Bowen retreated in good order, resisting until dark, when pursuit ended. Accompanied by three brigades, Bowen crossed Bayou Pierre near the railroad bridge; Baldwin's brigade withdrew through Port Gibson and across the Little Bayou Pierre. The bridges were burned by the Confederate rearguard.

Map 6. Battle of Raymond, May 12, 1863. The situation from noon to 1:30 p.m., showing the Confederate attack. On May 11 Pemberton concluded that Grant was merely feinting toward Jackson and that his main force would head for Big Black Bridge, east of Vicksburg. He wired General John Gregg, at Raymond, to strike the Vankees' in flank and rear as soon as they turned north. W. H. T. Walker was directed to move his brigade from Jackson to help Gregg.

Early on the 12th, Gregg's scouts notified him that a small enemy force was marching up the Utica road. Thinking that this was the "feint" mentioned by Pemberton, Gregg at once moved his 3,000 men to crush or capture the Yankees. The latter actually were the advance elements of McPherson's corps, 10,000 strong.

Gregg deployed a regiment each on the Gallatin and Utica roads, holding back a strong reserve. He emplaced Bledsoe's 3-gun battery to cover the bridge over Fourteen Mile Creek, which at 10 a.m. opened fire on the Union vanguard as it moved down the road toward the creek.

Map 3. Battle of Port Gibson, May 1, 1863—action from 8:15 a.m. to 10 a.m. This map portrays McClernand's initial assault on Bowen's Confederates deployed across two roads three miles west of Port Gibson.

On the plantation road Osterhaus' division gained 400 yards against Tracy's Confederate brigade (Tracy's command had made a 44-mile forced march from Vicksburg, during which a number of his men had straggled), then was stopped by heavy fire and made no additional advance until late in the afternoon. Tracy was killed early in the engagement, and Col. Isham Garrott assumed command of the brigade.

On the southerly road Benton's and Stone's brigades of Carr's division diverged into the ravines while advancing to attack Green's brigade of Bowen's division, thus leaving a gap in the center of Carr's line. McClernand shoved Hovey's division into this space, and his men worked forward through the tangle of canebrake unitl 10 a.m., when they assaulted. After a desperate struggle, Green fell back across Centers Creek.
