DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

*

The Kukaniloko birthstones are located next to a dusty plantation road and are partially surrounded by pineapple fields. The turn-off from Kamehameha Highway just north of the town of Wahiawa is marked with a Hawaii Visitors Bureau sign pointing toward Kukaniloko. The birthstones themselves are as red as the soil of the surrounding pineapple fields, hence, are apparently of local origin. The stones appear to be naturally occuring here and are embedded in the ground to an unknown depth. It is unlikely that they join underground as a contiguous stone mass, but are actually boulders. Their size varies from .5 to 2 meters along the longest dimension, while their shapes range from round to rectangular to asymmetrical.

Almost every stone has at least one large depression in its surface; many of the stones have several. These depressions were most likely originally merely natural, but undoubtedly were enlarged and made more symmetrical by the Hawaiians. Today, they appear as very smooth, round, sit-spots" in the rocks, with no signs of tools or human workmanship; only their uniform symmetry and design would indicate human craftsmanship. Each successful depression measures about .25 meter across and may be up to .1 meter deep, but these dimensions vary considerably. A channel runs from the low side of many of the holes that may well have been created by human hands, but no evidence of tool marks remains.

One can immediately visualize the use of these stone "sit-spots" in childbirth, for many of them have natural backrests behind the depressions, which would have given firm support to a straining mother-to-be. It is small wonder that these birthstones would have been revered and reserved for childbirth by chieftesses.

Kukaniloko is one of only two famous places in the State for the birth of children of high ranking chieftesses, and the only such place located on Oahu. Tradition holds that it was first established in about the 12th century A.D. and used continuously well into historic times. Birth at places such as Kukaniloko were held by the Hawaiians to add a special divine gift to the high rank held already by the children of chiefs. Extensive legendary material still exists in written form about the nature and process of childbirth at Kukaniloko. So highly was birth at Kukaniloko prized that Kamehameha I, the great king of Hawaii, made every attempt to have his wife, Queen Kapiolani, give birth to his son, Liholiho there, but her illness frustrated this. Thus, Kukaniloko was revered as a sacred place through at least A.D. 1797.

Therefore, Kukaniloko is a hallowed and sacred place in the legends of Hawaii and should be accorded the highest measure of protection.
