DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Built in the Greek Revival style, the house was constructed according to plans provided by the Boston architect, Isaiah Rogers (1800-1865). A document recently discovered in the house indicates that Forbes paid Rogers $52.50 for the plans. Captain Forbes took a personal hand in its design and construction, and the house, therefore, shows many traces of the nautical interest of its builder. Situated on a turf terrace at the summit of Milton Hill, it was built four-square with solid brick walls 18" thick, sheathed by ship's lap lathing. Its timbers were pre-cut in Maine, brought by coastal schooner to the Milton River and hauled up Milton Hill by ox team to be erected on the site. Originally, light was admitted to a half upper story through port holes surrounded with Ionic wreathes. A circular staircase similar to that in a lighthouse leads to the top floor which is surmounted by a large octagonal cupola enabling the captain's mother and sister to watch for ships entering and leaving Boston Harbor.

Changes to the house were made by the architectural firm of Peabody and Stearns in 1882-3 under the direction of the Captain's son, James Murray Forbes. At this time the roof was raised four feet, and the port holes were replaced by regular sash windows. The addition of a rear ell provided pantry and service quarters on the main floor and a large dressing room on the second floor. Several of the original "dove-gray" marble fire places on the main floor were replaced by the present mid-Victorian wooden mantels. A large screened-in porch was added off the library.

The interior of the house had been little altered except for modern additions of heating and plumbing. The original billiard room is now an exhibition area for papers of the Forbes and related families and for paintings of the China coast. Opposite this room is the Chinese Room, a parlor furnished with Chinese export pieces. The upstairs rooms retain furnishings original to the family but plans are underway to remove this and use the additional area for exhibition of the increasing collections of objects of the American China trade.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

A thriving trade with China formed one of the mainstays of the American shipping industry in the 19th century. Robert Bennet Forbes established himself as one of Boston's leading China merchants and his house, now a museum of the American China trade, vividly recalls Forbes' career.

History

Forbes was born into a mercantile family and became a merchant-sailor early in life. He joined his uncle's trading firm when he was 13 years old and was captain of a vessel by age 21. Late in the 1820's, young Forbes assumed responsibilities for his uncles' firm in China. He quickly succeeded, both to their and his benefit. Upon his return to Boston he married Rose Green Smith on January 20, 1834. The Panic of 1837 seriously hurt his business, which caused him to return to China to regain his financial position. In 1839 he became head of the great China firm of Russell and Company, his uncles' concern having merged with it, in China. During the Opium War his business boomed because the Chinese refused to allow British merchants to continue their trading operations. Forbes in 1849 became the head of Russell and Company and led the concern in subsequent years.

The China trade did not keep Forbes from engaging in many other activities. He owned or had interests in numerous merchant ships; and was an early advocate of steam-driven and iron-hulled vessels. Moreover, he sailed as a sport. A very humane person, he promoted aid to Ireland during the great famine, urged the development of coastal life saving facilities, and supported homes for sailors. During the Civil War, he constructed some ships for the Union at his own expense. Forbes also wrote a great deal, authoring several interesting volumes.

The house was built in 1833 on land purchased in 1816 by John M. Forbes (1771-1831). Forbes was a friend and classmate of John Quincy Adams, and after serving as Consul in northern Europe, became Charge d'Affaires in Buenos Aires when Adams was Secretary of State. The present house, which replaced an earlier building, was built by Captain Forbes, his younger brother, John M., and sisters, for their mother, Margaret Perkins Forbes, whose brothers, James and Thomas Perkins had founded the Boston-China Trade. This was the first of many China Trade associations with the house.

It was intended to be a memorial to Captain Forbes' elder brother, who while managing Perkins' interests, was drowned in a typhoon off Macao in 1829. Mrs. Forbes lived here until her death in 1854 after which her two unmarried daughters continued to live in it until 1865. In that year it was sold to John M. Forbes, who rented it to another China Trade merchant, Edward Cunningham, who had just returned from China. In 1871 the Captain's son, James Murray Forbes, having served his time with Russell and Company in China, returned to marry the granddaughter of Nathaniel Bowditch. Mrs. Bowditch bought the house and presented it to them as a wedding present. From 1871 until his death in 1937, James Murray Forbes continued to use the house as a country residence. The house then passed to his daughter, Mary Bowditch Forbes, who lived here until her death in 1961, after which it passed to the present Board of Trustees, who operate it as a museum of American trade with China.
