DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

"Prato Rio", as seen today was constructed in several stages. The stone portion, lived in by General Lee, was built in the mid-eighteenth century. It is a one story structure with an attic and basement. It faces southeast and its stonework is ashlar. An earlier log house had been constructed to the northwest prior to the stone structure.

In the first quarter of the nineteenth century, the original stone structure was virtually doubled in size by an extension to the northeast. This extension was also of stone but it was laid up in random ashlar.

By the late nineteenth century, the old log cabin was raised a story in height and joined to the original stone house. This rear appendage was covered with Victorian clapboards at this time and the earlier windows were replaced with windows dating to this change.

A composition shingle roof now covers the structure. The present owner has found oak shingles in the attic that are feathered in their short dimension, this indicating that they were laid to side lap as well as lapping in the conventional manner.

The window and door frames, as well as the doors and windows of the stone portion of the house, are of more recent derivation and the door and window sills are now concrete.

The existing built up box cornice is a recent feature. There undoubtedly was a porch on the front of the house but it no longer exists.

The original stone portion of the house was served by a corner fireplace and its chimney above the roof is stone and has a simple stone projecting cap. Another stone chimney at the southeast end appears to have been added, probably at the time the extension to the northeast was made. The stone chimney serving the early log structure was heightened when the second floor was constructed.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Other than the fact that "Hopewell" was one of the oldest homes in the area, it holds historical significance because it became the home of General Charles Lee, second in command in the Continental Army to only George Washington. In 1775, Lee renounced his half pay in the British Army in order to accept the position as Major General. Lee was already negotiating for the purchase of "Hopewell," partly to identify himself economically with the Americans and perhaps to further his military ambitions. His appointment was contingent upon Congress awarding him $30,000 so that he might own property locally in compensation for the confiscation of his British property.

When Lee became the owner of "Hopewell," he called it "Prato Verde" and later "Prato Rio," Spanish meaning "a stream through the meadow." While the eccentric Lee lived at "Prato Rio," he did without partitions in the house; instead, he used chalk lines to designate the various rooms. On December 12, 1776, Lee was captured by the British. When released, he returned temporarily to "Prato Rio," but soon rejoined Washington.

After Lee's court martial, he once again returned to "Prato Rio," this time to use his home as a base from which to send scalding replies to his charges. Finally, after his temper had partially cooled, he began to make plans for forming a military-agrarian community of his own.

It is said that Washington hoped to make an effort at reconciliation with Lee and asked to dine with him at "Prato Rio." When Washington arrived, he found "Lee's Lodge" closed with a note on the door saying, "No bread or bacon cooked today."

Having tentatively agreed to sell John Vaughn "Prato Rio" for 6,000 pounds, Lee set out for Philadelphia in September 1782, to complete the transaction, but died on October 2 before things could be settled.
