Freed, Julius, House, Gibson Co., TN

VII. DESCRIPTION

The Julius Freed House is located on a well-landscaped city lot of 1.81 acres on Eaton Street west of the county courthouse in Trenton, Gibson County, Tennessee. Built in circa 1871-72, the weatherboarded frame two-story dwelling, with asphalt shingle roof and brick foundation, exhibits the vernacular architectural form categorized as upright and wing (sometimes referred to as a gabled ell), with a prominent side gable extension on the western side of the main (north) facade. The house exhibits a strong degree of historic architectural integrity and has two contributing outbuildings standing south of the dwelling.

The north facade has three bays. The center bay contains the front entrance on the first floor, with the original single leaf wooden Eastlake-styled door now protected by a modern storm door. On the second floor is a companion doorway, again with the historic Eastlake-styled door intact that leads to a second story balcony. It, however, has an early twentieth century screen door. The windows of this facade all feature arched window hoods. The west bay has an one over one window, with original hardware intact, on the first floor while a double window of one over one lights is on the second floor. The eastern bay contains an Italianate-influenced and three-canted bay window on the first floor. An air-conditioner has been placed in the center window. These windows, too, are one over one, with the original glass intact. The first floor bay window is topped by a mansard-styled flat roof. Directly above is a double window, in the same style as the west bay, that leads to a tiny second floor balcony over the first floor bay window.

Unlike the typical upright and wing dwelling found in Tennessee, the front (north) facade of the Freed House has prominent gables, with returns, on both its west and east ends. Both gables have a small original ventilation grill. An original dormer window lies above the center bay and allowed light into the second floor center hallway. Connecting the gables is a wide cornice with regularly spaced pairs of of delicately cut brackets, typical of Italianate style. The bay window also has brackets immediately above its windows which are then topped by a wide cornice with much heavier, classically oriented brackets supporting the mansard roof of decorative cut shingles over the bay window. The front porch continues with the same paired bracket design found on the roof line, again supporting a mansard type roof of decorative cut shingles. Both mansard roofs over the bay window and the porch have original cast-iron railings, but in the mid-twentieth century an unknown family member added the distinctive cast iron cut-out figures of two cats on the bay window balcony. The original wooden porch, with delicate Victorian supports, was replaced between 1905 and 1910 with a concrete porch, supported by squared, paneled columns more in line with the Classical Revival then sweeping the country. Perhaps the most eye-catching element is the original rain gutter at the northwest corner of the dwelling. This metal gutter features a metal cut-out of a bird nesting at its very top.

The east elevation has undergone few changes since the 1870s. Two sections are discernible. The north section is two-story, with single Italianate-styled brackets on the wooden cornice. There are two original one over one windows, with decorative wooden Italianate-influenced lintels, at the northernmost end and a smaller one over one window, again with a decorative wooden Italianate-influenced lintel, on the second floor on the southern end. This small window provided light to a second-story bathroom. A corbeled brick central chimney is also evident in the two-story section. The southern section of the west elevation, however, differs from the two-story section. It is one-story and its cornice lacks decorative brackets, except for where a three-window bay window touches the roof line. The cornice of this bay window has the similar low-relief decorative bracketing found on the north facade windows. South of the bay window are two irregularly spaced one over one windows. The southernmost window is smaller and was probably altered when the kitchen area was modernized in the late 1930s. Between these two windows is a ventilation grill also added during the kitchen modernization.

The south elevation is the rear of the house and here the changes that the house experienced in the early twentieth century begin to become apparent. The three original interior corbeled brick chimneys are evident as is a modern brick chimney added to the exterior when the kitchen was modernized in the late 1930s. The elevation takes the form of the nineteenth-century "piano-box" vernacular form with two gable ends, with returns, connected by a center section. A wide, plain cornice links the three sections. There are windows in each gable end. The eastern one over one window is smaller than the western and was probably altered during the kitchen modernizations of the late 1930s. The western window, however, is four over four, double-hung. The center section has a modern storm door, flanked by two sets of matching windows and covered by a metal awning. This area was once a screened-in porch, but during the 1930s the family used wood paneling and the new windows to enclose the space. At this time they also added the present concrete steps and metal stair rail.

The west elevation exhibits the house's most significant architectural changes since its original construction. According to a historic photograph published in W. P. Greene's Gibson County, Tennessee: A Series of Pen and Picture Sketches (1901), the original west elevation contained two sections. The north section was two-story, with a paired decorative cornice, with returns, in the gable end. A double one over one window, with a low-relief decorative bracket lintel, stood on the second floor, while another three-window bay window, with Italianate-styled decorative brackets, mansard roof, and cast-iron railing, brought light into the first floor. The historic photograph also partially documents a south section of one-story, with the gable end facing west, that had featured a slightly arched four over four window with the shutters. The two-story north section is largely intact today. However, in the 1930s the family built a bathroom extension out from the southernmost window of the bay window. This extension has a flat roof, with a small window in its eastern end, and is poorly incorporated within the rest of the dwelling. The gable-end one-story wing documented in the 1901 photograph has also been changed. Probably altered during the time of the new porch construction in 1905 to 1910, this section is a largely unadorned extension of three rooms with a wide plain cornice linking three regularly spaced windows. Because each of the windows have the same slightly arched lintel noted in the historic photograph, and the interior woodwork is similar to the rest of the dwelling, it is believed that this section is the original wing, but that it was turned into a L-wing for unknown reasons in the early twentieth century.

The interior of the dwelling has many intact historic features. Its light fixtures, except for the ceiling fan added in the enclosed back porch on the first floor, date to the period when electricity became available in Trenton at the turn of the century. Pine hardwood floors exist throughout the house, although some floors have been carpeted. Steam radiators, added in circa 1928, are located throughout the dwelling as well. The interior floor plan of the house is a central hall plan variation typical of upright and wing form. From the front door, you enter a long central hall, measuring 12' 5" by 17' 11", that has the original staircase on the west side. The staircase features an original paneled newel post and original turned balusters. Flanking the center hall are a parlor (east) and a bedroom

National Park ServiceNational Register of Historic Places

Freed, Julius, House, Gibson Co., TN

(west), which is now a pool room. As is common in this type of house, the parlor is the room created by the side gable and bay window on the front facade. Measuring 18' by 22' 2", the room has 12" wooden baseboards and original pine hardwood floors. The fireplace has tile flooring and the wooden decorative painted mantle is a very prominent, and significant, feature. Painted in the plain painter tradition by an unknown artist, the mantle has been decorated to simulate marble and has Eastlake-influenced geometrical designs and floral patterns. Directly above the coal grate is a landscape painting of a river valley. To either side of the grate are two additional landscape paintings. The west painting is a stream with trees; the east painting is of trees with hills.

The bedroom (now pool room) on the opposite side of the hallway also features a decorative painted mantle. No landscape paintings exist, but the mantle has been marbelized and also features geometric designs in the Eastlake tradition. The room measures 22' 6" by 16' 11" and has the original pine hardwood floors. Baseboards are 12" high and on the east side of the mantle is an original closet. In the southwest corner of the room is the door to the bathroom, added in the 1930s, previously noted on the west elevation. This bathroom exhibits some Art Deco design elements in its mirror, geometric designs in the tile, and a streamlined overhang over the tub. In general, it is representative of the standardized bathroom fixtures of the 1930s.

The basic floor plan of the entrance rooms of the house is generally repeated throughout the first floor. South of the parlor is the original dining room, which has 3' wooden wainscoting and measures 16' 11" by 21' 5". The room has original pine hardwood floors and three significant built-in features: a corner cupboard in the northeast corner, a classical influenced mantle, with overmantle mirror and the original grate, in the southwest corner, and in the northwest corner French doors with beveled glass that connects the parlor to the dining room.

The west wall of this room, however, was altered when the dwelling was remodeled for the use of the Senior Citizens Club after the city acquired the property in 1975. Its original opening to the central hall was enlarged and then the west wall of the central hall was removed so that the hall and what had been an original bedroom became one large (over 30 feet long) meeting room. The hall retains its original 3' wainscoting, but its pine hardwood floors were carpeted. The bedroom had no wainscoting and its pine hardwood floors have also been carpeted. In the southwest corner of the room is a door for another bathroom, which was modernized in the 1930s in the Art Deco style.

The rear sections of the first floor also mirror alterations made in the 1930s. South of the dining room is a pantry, then the kitchen. Both rooms were redecorated in the 1930s and most of the fixtures and hardware in both rooms date to that decade. An arched entrance was cut into the pantry's south wall to lead directly to the kitchen. The family recalls that $5,000 was spent on remodeling the two rooms. West of the kitchen was the original rear porch of the house. This space, however, was enclosed during the 1930s renovations to create a sitting room. The original use of the room is clear from the weatherboard paneling still evident on the east and west walls of the room. On the east wall is a door to the kitchen while on the west wall are two matching doors leading to an original bedroom (now used for storage), measuring 15' 7" by 11' 10" and the earlier mentioned bathroom, measuring 15' 7" by 7' 6". On the north wall of the porch/sitting room (leading to the central hall) is an original Eastlake-styled door with a stained glass window.

The second floor of the dwelling has a central hall plan arrangement similar to that on the first floor. Original pine hardwood floors are intact and wooden baseboards, measuring 11", can be found in the three primary spaces: hall, master bedroom, and guest bedroom. The hall's north wall has an Eastlake-styled door that leads to a balcony. On its east wall is a door that leads into the large master bedroom. On the south wall of the master bedroom is an original wooden mantle, flanked by closets. The central hall's west wall has a door that leads into the guest bedroom. Again on the south wall of this room is an original wooden mantle, flanked by closets.

At the southwest corner of the second floor's central hall is the staircase. On the south wall of the central hall is a door that leads into a large storage area while south of this space is a small door that leads into the unfinished attic. At the southeast corner of the central hall is a door that leads into the second floor bathroom. This room too reflects Art Deco styling in its tilework, very similar to that found on the first floor, and dates to the 1930s.

The property has two contributing outbuildings. Immediately south of the dwelling is a weatherboard frame tool house (C) that dates to circa 1920. This building was the service area for the property's once extensive gardens. On the southern border is a weatherboard frame garage (C) that was built circa 1920.

Remaining elements of the early twentieth century landscaped gardens constitute a contributing site (C) in this nomination. For example, in the early 1900s, the family would plant some five to ten thousand tulips throughout the large lot. Implanted concrete walks, Celtic cross designs, and planters can still be found throughout the yard, suggesting the basic outlines of the gardens.

Defining the northern border of the property, separating the yard from the sidewalk, is a cast-iron fence that dates to at least 1900. This fence (C) is a second contributing structure in this nomination.

VIII. SIGNIFICANCE

The Julius Freed House, originally constructed in circa 1871-72, is eligible for the National Register of Historic Places for its significant association with Julius Freed, an important Jewish merchant in Trenton from the Reconstruction Era to the early twentieth century who was significant in the commercial development and history of Trenton. It is also eligible for its local significance in architecture as a historically intact example of an Italianate-influenced upright and wing vernacular dwelling and in art for its decorative painted mantles of the plain painter tradition.

Born in Prussia on January 25, 1835, Julius Freed immigrated to the United States as a young man in 1854, arriving in Columbus, Georgia, where he worked as a peddler. Three years later, Freed moved to Memphis and established a dry goods business. In 1860, he left for the railroad junction town of Jackson where he remained in business until April 1861. Following Governor Isham Harris's call for the militia, Freed left his Jackson business to join a company originally organized in Memphis. Consequently he served in the Fifteenth Tennessee Infantry of the Army of Tennessee, and was wounded in battle at Perryville, Chickamauga, and during the Atlanta campaign. Captured during Hood's attack on Nashville in December 1864, Freed became a prisoner of war for the rest of the Civil War.

Upon his release in May 1865, Freed moved to Trenton, a small railroad town and county seat in Gibson County. Like other hopeful entrepreneurs, Freed looked to build his fortune out of the ashes of the Civil War. But as a thirty-old Jewish merchant, Freed was eventually transformed in his private life as he adapted his ethnic background to the rural, Anglo-Saxon, and protestant world of Trenton and Gibson County. "Although Julius became a respected member of the community," observed family historian Lisa Freed, "the family's assimilation was never total because, like most Jews living in small towns in the South, Julius believed in preserving his heritage." (1)

In the late antebellum era, the South in general had attracted German Jewish immigrants because the setting and market conditions were like those many had experienced in Germany: largely rural, dependent on small trade centers where even a small amount of capital could go far. Julius' early career in the South certainly matched that general trend. Beginning as a peddler in Columbus, Georgia, he amassed enough capital to start his own small business in Memphis before moving to Jackson just as it was becoming an important regional railroad center at the start of the Civil War.

When he arrived in Trenton in 1865, Freed established a partnership with another new German Jewish merchant, Julius Ebert, as the major partner. At this time, Freed had already taken several steps toward cultural assimilation. His initial work as a peddler led him to lose his German accent and he thoroughly accepted regional foodways. But his "Hebraic features," as the family put it, still made Freed appear as the outsider, someone different in the community. Yet serving in the Civil War had accelerated his assimilation. As historian Lisa Freed noted, the war "Americanized" southern Jews "and enhanced their status." Freed "was chauvinistic about the South and proud of his service in the Confederacy" and he "became a charter member of the Col. R. M. Russell Camp No. 906, of the Confederate Veterans. (2) He also became a member of the Ku Klux Klan in a county that was particularly a stronghold for the organization. Freed joined because, in the words of his son, "all the Southern people did" and because it gave him more legitimacy, and acceptance, as a member of the community. In 1876, he became a member of a local fraternal lodge, the Peabody Lodge of the K of H (no reference to the full name of K of H can be located), and later joined the Knights of Pythias, which further signified his assimilation and acceptance in the Anglo culture of Trenton. (3)

The Ebert & Freed store met with gradual success and in 1871, Freed had gained enough financial independence to marry Henrietta Cohn, a German Jewish immigrant and the sister-in-law of Ebert. It was at this time, or within the following year, that Freed and his wife began the construction of their home on Eaton Street. During this decade, following the death of his partner Ebert in 1878, Freed opened his own business on the town square and by the late 1880s he too had taken in a German Jewish partner, as his business was known as J. Freed and Oppenheimer Dry Goods. He became a major investor in, and a trustee of, the local bank.

With his business success came political power. He served as a city alderman during the 1880s and in 1897 he was placed on the city board to manage the waterworks of Trenton. Yet, although Julius and his wife Henrietta assimilated to the foodways, lifestyles, and upper class customs of Southern life, they maintained several of their cultural traditions. According to the family history, they "inwardly maintained a consciousness of their Jewish identity." (4) For example, since the nearest synagogue (Temple Adas Israel--NR 1/9/79) was at Brownsville, the mother led observations of all of the Jewish holidays and special occasions at the home. Freed closed his store on these days as well. The family also sent all of the male children to the nearest Rabbi (Jackson or Memphis) for the infants to be circumcised. But while the family largely kept their religion private, they could not escape negative stereotypes of Jews that traveling revival shows would periodically bring to Trenton. Family historian Lisa Freed concluded that Julius Freed "never denied his heritage and he had contempt for those who did, especially the converted Jews brought to town as exhibits by evangelists touring the rural communities." As one of Freed's sons recalled,

You closed your store when these revivals were on. So they had this converted Jew preaching . . . And they marched down, the schoolchildren marched, and my father stood out in front of his store and this converted Jew who was leading the parade . . . came by and he knew that my father thought there was a little hypocrisy in that And he stopped and . . . he said something to my father: 'Well it's all right, it's all right.' My father said, "Well don't go on the other side of the street, 'cause if you're doing all right I'm gonna work the other side of the street myself!"

Freed maintained a position of prominence in Trenton until his death in 1908. In 1893, he had taken his son Henry into his mercantile business, now called J. Freed & Son (later Freed & Sons). When local businessmen compiled a booster history of the county in 1901, Julius Freed and his home were both pictured as examples of the best Gibson County had to offer. As his son later recalled, Julius Freed had established the mercantile business of Trenton, with the best stock of goods available and a very loyal patronage. The profits from the store allowed Freed and later his sons to continually expand the family's investments into local real estate and a cotton gin. Julius Freed had submerged enough of his Jewish identity to become part of the political, social, and economic ruling class of Trenton. Yet he remained proud of his ethnic heritage and the family, at home, maintained Jewish cultural traditions until his death.

After Julius Freed's death, five of his children continued to live in the house for the remainder of their lives and the changes the house experienced during the early twentieth century can be attributed to their needs and tastes. Their gracious home

United States Department of the Interior
National Park ServiceNational Register of Historic Places
Continuation SheetSection number 8 Page 10

Freed, Julius, House, Gibson Co., TN

was "filled with oriental rugs and ornate fireplaces. Every wall of the dining room was lined with cabinets, filled with china, crystal and silver." Helen Freed called the house "Villa Freed," and she and her sister Katie surrounded the dwelling with "a beautiful garden full of roses, tulips, hyacinths, and buttercups." (6) The Freeds took on the trappings of the Southern upper-class, even hiring African-American youngsters as playmates and joining the United Daughters of the Confederacy.

The children of Julius and Henrietta Freed proved much more assimilated than their parents ever were. The family even came to practice such Christian holidays as Christmas and Easter. "In a small town, without a wider Jewish community to buttress a sense of religious independence, it is a great deal to ask of a family to be the only house on the block with a somber mood at Christmastime," concluded historian Eli Evans. "Some Jews gave in slowly, others acquiesced totally, a few watched their children convert and blend in completely." (7)

The Freed children became one of the dominant families in Trenton during the first half of the twentieth century. Joe Freed was a local political power, serving as a city alderman for over 35 years and becoming a political ally of Senator Kenneth McKellar. Sylvane Freed was president of the Bank of Trenton and stayed involved with this institution for over 60 years." In 1961, two local historians concluded that the Freeds "have made many contributions [a city fountain, ball park] to the town's public good, especially to the city schools, where they were all happy in the early school days." (8) One of the family's last acts of generosity was to give the city an unique and valuable set of Veilleuse-Theieres (night light teapots) from the collection of Dr. Frederick Freed and to donate the family home as a memorial to Julius and Henrietta Freed in 1975-76.

The house is also eligible for listing in the National Register of Historic Places as a significant local example of upright and wing Victorian-influenced architecture and for the local plain painter tradition represented by the two first floor mantles. Built in circa 1871-72, the house's upright and wing Victorian configuration was a first for Trenton (judging by the dates of the remaining historic buildings in town). Its architectural distinctiveness was also demonstrated when the dwelling was one of the few Trenton homes included in the 1901 booster publication about Gibson County. The building exhibits both Italianate influences (the brackets on the cornice; the bay windows) and Second Empire influences (mansard-like roofs on the balconies) typical of vernacular-based structures built in the region following the Civil War. Both Victorian styles were actually introduced before the war, but in smaller southern towns Italianate and Second Empire-influenced homes were often built during the Reconstruction Era.

The painted mantles in the parlor and the bedroom (now pool room) of the first floor are the only identified examples of decorative interior painting known in Trenton. The artist is unknown. The reliance on Eastlake designs shown on both Freed mantles is reminiscent of a decorative painted ceiling at the Meady White House in Saltillo, Hardin County (NR 7/1/93). But the decorative scheme at the Meady White House did not include any extant examples of landscape painting, as found on the parlor mantle of the Freed House. The depicted scenes include a quiet river valley, a stream in a forest, and trees in the hills. The best documented plain painter of Tennessee during the late Victorian period, Fred Swanton who worked in Middle Tennessee during the 1880s, shows a reliance on landscape motifs. (9) Southerners became entranced by landscape painting in the late antebellum period and continued to prefer these scenes of unblemished nature at the time the Freed House was constructed. As extant local examples of this under-documented art form in Tennessee, the painted landscape scenes on the parlor mantle are of unusual significance and deserving of further study.
