Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Hendricks County Jail is a large brick structure located just one block south of the Courthouse Square in Danville, Indiana. Completed in 1867, the building was designed to provide both jail facilities and a residence for the County Sheriff, and remained in use for over 100 years. Since the construction of a new jail in 1974, the building has housed the Hendricks County Museum and the offices of the local Civil Defense.

The front section of the building, the former Sheriff's residence, was constructed in the French Second Empire style and features a mansard roof, a raised basement, and an irregular plan. The basement area features double-hung windows set in segmental-arched openings, with plain wide hood molds. A stone water table separates the basement area of the structure from the ground floor, and also forms the sills for the first floor windows. The northernmost window unit on the ground floor level of the east (main) facade consists of a pair of segmental-arched windows separated by a cast iron pilaster; similar segmental-arched windows with label hood molds are used individually throughout the rest of the ground floor.

The main entry to the building is located in a recessed area on the east facade, and consists of a pair of wood panel doors contained in a large segmental-arched opening. A wide, plain label hood mold appears immediately over this opening. The small porch roof which shelters this entryway originally featured cast iron pilasters, but these have been removed. Immediately south of this entryway is the building's three story, square tower. Identical to the rest of the building on the basement and first floor levels, this tower features smaller segmental-arched windows on the second floor level, with those on the east facade paired. A delicate stone string course appears above these windows, separating them from the low, wide, rectangular windows located just below the cornice line. The wide, heavy cornice here has also been stripped of its modillions, and the tower's mansard roof, originally slate, has been recovered with asphalt shingles. Rounded arch dormers with oculus windows originally appeared on each face of the tower, but these have been removed.

The jail section of the building consists of a one story wing with a hipped roof projecting from the west (rear) side of the building. This section lacks the decorative elements employed on the front section of the building, except for the large, overhanging cornice. Windows in this section are rectangular, and still feature the iron bars installed to prevent prisoner escape. On this section of the building, also, the cornice modillions have been removed and the slate roof replaced with asphalt shingles.

Three major additions have been made to the building since its construction in 1867. The first of these, constructed shortly after the turn of the century, is a one story, flat-roofed, brick structure located on the north side of the jail. Referred to as the powerhouse, this addition housed the equipment which supplied heat and electrical power to the third county courthouse. This addition features segmental-arched windows and a stone water table. The low parapet wall above the roof features a tile cap. The second addition, dating from 1958, projects out from the south side of the jail wing. Constructed of brick with a stone foundation, this addition has rectangular windows with detailing similar to that found on the jail windows. This section, built to house juvenile offenders, also has a flat roof. Its parapet wall is topped with a stone cap. In the 1960's a third addition was constructed on the north wall, east of the powerhouse. Less sensitively designed than the previous two additions, this structure is a plain concrete block garage with no ornamental detailing.

The interior of both the jail wing and the Sheriff's quarters remain substantially unaltered. The original cells, barred windows, and other ironwork are still in place in the jail wing. All but one of the fireplaces in the Sheriff's quarters have been covered over, but the floors, ceilings, and woodwork throughout this section of the building have been either preserved or restored.

Statement of Significance (~~in one paragraph~~)

The Hendricks County Jail is significant for its role in the county's governmental system for over a century. Constructed in 1866-1867, the building is an example of French Second Empire style architecture adapted to suit local needs. It remained in use as both jail and Sheriff's residence until 1974, when a new jail was built. Now the home of the Hendricks County Museum, the building remains a prominent local landmark.

According to local government records, county officials recognized the need for a new jail in January, 1865. Martin Gregg, one of the county commissioners, was authorized to examine the jails in the neighboring counties and prepare an estimate of the cost of erecting a new jail building in Danville, the county seat. Gregg, who served as a commissioner for 14 years and also supervised construction of the second county courthouse and poor-house, had plans prepared by a local architect and received permission to begin construction in December, 1865. The building was completed in early 1867 at a cost of just over $25,000, and was used for the next 107 years. Additions were made to the building at three different times, but finally, in 1974, it was judged inadequate and a new jail was constructed.

Both sections of the building have retained a significant amount of integrity on the interior, with the unaltered jail wing being of particular interest. Three additions have been made to the structure, but their low elevations prevent them from being overly obtrusive.
