DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The Harriet Beecher Stowe House at Brunswick, Maine, stands on the eastern side of Federal Street (number 63) just north of its intersection with the right-of-way of the Maine Central Railroad. The oldest sections of the frame building, the main block and a rear ell, were constructed in 1807 for the Rev. Benjamin Titcomb, who came to Brunswick from Portland to be the first minister of a newly formed Baptist Society. The builder was Samuel Melcher III, who was responsible for a number of the finest Federal period buildings in Brunswick. Although there is no definite information on the original appearance of the house, it is assumed that both sections were two stories with gabled roofs. The main block followed a center hall plan with two rooms on each floor, and there were probably four additional rooms in the ell. A wooden barn with gabled roof stood at the rear (east) of the house.

Following the Stowe residence (1850-52) and probably after 1854 when the Titcomb heirs sold the property to William Hall, a local businessman, the house was extensively rebuilt and given Victorian detailing including marble or painted cast-iron fireplace surrounds; corner pilasters with inset panels; heavy window caps; a recessed front entrance with projecting cornice and transom and sidelights of stained, etched glass; and a heavy cornice at the roof line of both the main block and ell. Their proportions indicate that the 6/6 sash windows were also enlarged at this time. As a result of this work, there is nothing in the present appearance of the house to suggest a date for it earlier than mid-19th century.

In 1946 the Stowe House was purchased for use as an inn and since that time a series of owners have made further significant alterations in the property. Between 1946 and 1957 a restaurant was located on the first floor of the house, guest rooms on the second, and a gift shop in the former barn. The shed dormer and enclosed, one-story porch on the south side of the ell and the two-story addition on its north side may date from this period. In 1957 the restaurant was moved to the barn, which was attached to the house by an addition at the rear (east) of the ell and enlarged to provide kitchen facilities. The original kitchen with its massive fireplace became a cocktail lounge. Additional property to the south and east of the house was acquired in 1958 to allow space for expanded parking and construction of a 54-room motel unit.

Within the last three years (1973-75) the barn/restaurant has been further enlarged by the creation of a second floor lounge, the second floor of the main house adapted for use as a manager's residence, and the original kitchen converted to a registration area (the fireplace remains but appears to be covered with new brick). Harriet Beecher Stowe's sitting room (southwest corner of the main house) is now a gift shop (architectural details are largely obscured by shelving) and the remaining first-floor rooms, with some walls removed, have been converted to a tavern--"Harriet's Place"-- with decor featuring church pews and back-lighted stained glass. Thus, while the Stowe House remains in good condition structurally, much of its historical integrity has been destroyed.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

This 2 1/2-story frame house on Federal Street in Brunswick, Maine, was from 1850 to 1852 the home of author and humanitarian Harriet Beecher Stowe. It was here that she wrote Uncle Tom's Cabin, her best known work and the most famous example of American anti-slavery literature. Few volumes have generated such widespread public reaction or had such direct impact on the course of American history. Published as a serial in the National Era in 1851 and in book form the following year, Uncle Tom's Cabin became an overnight sensation in the United States and Europe and was eventually translated into 23 languages. Its author became the object of violent hatred throughout the South and was saluted by President Lincoln as "the little lady who started this great war."

The original section of the Stowe House at Brunswick was constructed for the Rev. Benjamin Titcomb in 1807 and remained in his family until 1854. The next owner, William Hall, made the first of many substantial alterations, both exterior and interior, which account for the present appearance of the building. The Stowe House is now part of a popular restaurant/motel complex and is accessible to the public on a regular basis.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Harriet Elizabeth Beecher, daughter of noted Congregational minister, Lyman Beecher, was born at Litchfield, Connecticut, on June 14, 1811. After her mother's death in 1815, Harriet was strongly influenced by her eldest sister Catherine and was first a student and then a teacher in the school which the latter opened at Hartford. In 1832 the family moved to Cincinnati, Ohio, where Lyman Beecher became president of the newly founded Lane Theological Seminary. Harriet became an assistant at the Western Female Institute, established by Catherine, and soon began to contribute stories and sketches to local journals. In 1836 she married Calvin Ellis Stowe, a native of Massachusetts and a professor at Lane. With his encouragement, she continued writing and in 1843 published The Mayflower, or Sketches of Scenes and Characters Among the Descendants of the Pilgrims.

Mrs. Stowe lived at Cincinnati for 18 years in all. During that period she met fugitive slaves and learned from her friends and from her own visits to Kentucky something of life in the South. Calvin Stowe returned to New England with his family in 1850 to become Professor of Natural and Revealed Religion at Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Maine. There, drawing on her own experiences and those of her brother, Henry Ward Beecher, who had traveled in the deep South, Mrs. Stowe wrote Uncle Tom's Cabin, or Life Among the Lowly. Intended primarily as a humanitarian appeal against the evils of slavery, the work was equally, if not more, effective as a romance and a portrait of American manners.

Uncle Tom's Cabin began to appear in serial form in the National Era, an anti-slavery paper published at Washington, D.C., in 1851 and was issued as a book the following year. Though no one had expected the book to be a popular success, 10,000 copies were sold the first week, 300,000 within the year; sales of the pirated English edition reached 1 1/2 million. The violent reaction which the book evoked was equally unexpected. The Southern Literary Messenger declared it "a criminal prostitution of the higher function of the imagination" and added that Mrs. Stowe had "placed herself without the pale of kindly treatment at the hands of Southern criticism." A cousin living in Georgia told Mrs. Stowe that she did not dare receive letters with her name on the outside of the envelope. The author's reply to Southern criticism of inaccuracy and sectional bias was A Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin (1853), a collection of factual material on slavery intended to justify the charges implied in the novel.

With her next work, Dred: a Tale of the Dismal Swamp (1856), Mrs. Stowe shifted from a humanitarian to an economic approach, arguing the wastefulness and inevitable deterioration of a society based on slave labor. After the success of that second novel (100,000 copies were sold in England in less than a month), Mrs. Stowe led the life of a woman of letters. The Atlantic Monthly, (established in 1857), the New York Independent, and the Christian Union carried her articles regularly. She continued to produce novels (The Minister's Wooing, 1859, is best known) and wrote numerous studies of New England social life in both fiction and essays (titles include The Pearl of Orr's Island, 1862; Oldtown Folks, 1869; and Poganuc People, 1878). Mrs. Stowe also published a small volume of religious poems and toward the end of her career gave some public readings of her work.

The Stowe family had remained at Brunswick only two years, moving in 1852 to Andover, Massachusetts, where Calvin Stowe became a professor at a theological seminary. On his retirement in 1863, the family moved to Hartford. After the Civil War, Mrs. Stowe purchased a small estate in Florida, where she spent many winters. Following the death of her husband in 1886, she lived in seclusion at Hartford until her own death on July 1, 1896.

The Harriet Beecher Stowe House is now one component in a restaurant and motel complex located on Lot 84 on the east side of Federal Street in Brunswick, Maine. Boundaries of the national historic landmark designation for the Stowe House are drawn to include those elements of the complex associated with Harriet Beecher Stowe--the house, rear ell and barn (now converted for use as a restaurant and attached to the ell)--and to exclude those elements which do not contribute to the national significance of the property--the motel structure and parking areas. Specific lines are defined as follows: beginning at the intersection of the eastern curbline of Federal Street and the southern line of residential property at 61 Federal Street; thence, easterly by said southern line and the southern line of residential property at 10 Maple Street to its intersection with a line parallel to and ten feet east of the eastern line of the Stowe restaurant (the converted barn); thence, southerly along said eastern parallel line to its intersection with a line parallel to and ten feet south of the southern line of the restaurant structure; thence, westerly along said southern parallel line extended to the eastern curbline of Federal Street; thence, northerly along said eastern curbline to the point of beginning.
